Jeff Mattney was recently at the Siletz reservation, and while there met with an unusual experience. He and an Indian, John Williams by name, were digging a grave for old Tyee-John, late chief of the Siletz, whose death occurred recently, when they found evidence of another grave. Continuing with their excavating they restored the bones of old chief Palmer, who died 53 years ago. In the grave was a sword, also a horse, pistol and priceless beads. The implements of warfare were badly decayed, but strange to say the old Indian's blankets were in a splendid state of preservation. An old buck remembered the presentation of sword and pistol at Fort Hoskias over 50 years ago to Chief Palmer by the American colonel in charge of the fort. The incident has an unnatural interest attached to it.
