Improvements on the Upper River.

David B. Ogden, assistant United States engineer, has returned from an inspection tour up the Willamette river. He reports the work on the revetment at Independence has been completed for the season.

The revetment is about 1,300 ft. in length, and has been in process of construction for the past four months. Next spring, if more funds are available, it is the intention to extend it up the river 800 feet further. It is situated at a bend in the river, and during high water a channel has been formed at the point. The object which the engineers hope to accomplish is to keep all the water in the main channel.

Mr Ogden reports that the improvement has cost in the neighborhood of $10,000. He believes, however, that it will be permanent and of lasting benefit. It is paved with large stone, and has a gradual slope back from the water's edge. The revetment throughout is built of sand, brush and rocks. The surface has been covered with a heavy layer of willow brush. The engineers had a two-fold object in view by covering the revetment with willow saplings. They say that this will catch all the sediment washed ashore at that point, and at the same time young trees will sprout up from the limbs. In fact, they are already showing considerable evidence of life, and they expect the top of the revetment to be well lined with a thrifty growth of willows in a year or two.

When this occurs there will be more danger of the river cutting out a new channel at that point. A wire fence has been built at the revetment to prevent stock from browsing on the young buds and destroying the Journal.
