UNIVERSITY APPROPRIATION

Moscow Idaho Paper Scores Oregon Farmers.

Considerable interest is felt in Idaho concerning the proposed of fort says the Moscow Evening Journal, by some of the farmers in the Willamette valley of Oregon to invoke the referendum against the appropriation made by the last legislature of the state in support of the state university at Eugene. The support of this educational institution has heretofore been fixed at $41,000 per annum. The new act raises the sum to $125,000 per year, and it is against this increase that these grangers are making their objection.

It is to be hoped for the sake of the higher education in Oregon, and for the good name of the farming community everywhere, that this plan, intended to at least defer this appropriation and possibly defeat it entirely, will not be carried out. Oregon needs the state university and her people are abundantly able to support it up to the point of effectiveness where it can accomplish something, and its service will be worth much more than what they cost. In these times when higher education is a requisite for a successful career it would be a great mistake for any state to dispense with or cripple its chief educational institution of learning. Not only would such action work an injury to the people directly affected, but it would do incredible harm to the state beyond its borders. Progressive American people who are looking for new homes in the Pacific Northwest would shun a state that has put such a blight upon its future.

Not only will these farmers who propose to invoke the referendum in this instance harm the state in the estimation of the people outside of its borders, but they will cast odium upon farmers generally. Agriculture is reaping more benefits today from higher education than any of the trades, mechanics or commercial interests. If the farmers of Oregon don't know this, they should study a little. They should keep abreast of the of other states, and then they would be enthusiastic advocates of higher education and willing to pay reasonably well to sustain it.
