BAD RUPTURE IN NAVY CIRCLES

Washington, Dec. 26.—Not since the day preceding the passage of the personnel law ten years ago has the feeling between the line and staff officers of the navy been so acute as today as the result of the refusal of admiral Brownson to transmit orders from his superior officer, the president of the United States, assigning a naval surgeon to the command of vessels in the navy. Differences between the line and staff just at the beginning of the congressional session may have a bad effect upon the legislation to secure four great battleships, cruisers and other war vessels. Through the published statement of Surgeon-General Rixey the merits of the doctor's side of the case have been clearly set forth and the line officers believe in common fairness they should have a hearing, but are embarrassed by reason of the fact that Admiral Brownson preceded his resignation by a cold, clear, logical presentation of the reasons why he objected to the assignment of a physician to command a naval ship, even though the vessel was exclusively devoted to hospital use. Applications at the White House have been made for copies of Brownson's refusal, it being clearly impossible for Brownson or any of his line officers to make public a copy of the letter without incurring the risk of court-martial on charges of disrespect toward a superior officer, the president of the United States. So they can only look for a change in the executive mind, or a congressional investigation, which will develop all the facts. In the absence of the text of Brownson's letter it may be said that his objection is two-fold, in that like every line officer he believed that subordination of any line officer, no matter how low in grade, to a staff officer on shipboard is a bad policy and subversive of naval discipline, but a stronger objection, to his mind, was that the proposed action is illegal, it being forbidden by law or naval regulation to assign a staff officer to the command of ships. The staff officers believe this feature to be debatable.
