I consulted physicians and tried various remedies, but without getting any relief, until I despaired of ever being well again. Finally, I took Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and in a very short time, was entirely cured. I can, therefore, cordially and confidently commend this medicine to all."—J. Rosello, Victoria, Texas.

CURIOSITIES OF DREAMS.

Scientific Views of the Queer Things We Do and See While Asleep.

The causes and classification of dreams is a subject that, although it has been discussed from time immemorial, seems to be as little understood, beyond a certain point, as it was ages ago. At the hypnotic congress held in Paris recently much time was spent in considering this question, and though some interesting theories were brought forth the savants were but little wiser when the discussion ended than when it began.

A compatriot of Ibsen, Dr. Mourley Vold, professor in the University of Christiania, gave the result of numerous experiments made upon himself and others who had lent themselves to the cause of science in trying to ascertain the dividing line between the role played in dreams by the cutaneous and muscular senses and between the true images of the day and the phantoms of the night.

You rarely dream, this savant says, that you are lying down, but generally that you are standing or sitting in a way corresponding to the position of the member which makes its impression upon the mind. For example, if one dreams that he is standing on tiptoe, it will be found that his toes are pressing hard against the footboard of the bed. Dreams of walking, running, dancing and the like are always produced by the position of the feet.

Another of this doctor's theories is that when we dream our minds, to a certain extent, become as they were when we were children. In support of this he says that when a dreamer, with half awakened sense, sees his hand before him he instinctively begins to count the fingers. This is because the dormant senses reduce the sleeper's mind to a childish state of feebleness, and it is in infancy that our first lessons in computation begin upon our fingers.

The visual impressions of the day form another class of dreams. Dr. Mourley Vold is of the opinion that happy days are followed by pleasant dreams, and vice versa. Every one knows, however, that this is not always the case.

At the conclusion of the learned Norwegian's address one of the oldest of his listeners—one of the most celebrated physicians in Paris—remarked to a colleague that if one has had bad dreams it is because of indigestion, or too much clothes on the bed, or too little air in the room, or because his wife snores, or because he is lying in an uncomfortable position, and that with proper precautions there should be only pleasant dreams or none at all.—New York World.

He Bought His Own Statue.

There was grief in a South Side household one day when a careless servant allowed a valuable piece of statuary to fall and break in a dozen pieces. The girl had a good cry and offered to pay for the marble, but that was out of the question. The manservant, who was also coachman and landscape gardener, was instructed to take the fragments of the art treasure and dispose of them. It happened that he knew a thing or two. Instead of dumping the pieces into an ash barrel he took them to a repair shop, where they were carefully glued together by an expert workman. When the job was completed, the servant took the marble to a dealer in antiquities and objects of art, explained how he came into possession of it and received an equivalent of two weeks' wages above the cost of repairs.

Some weeks later the original owner came upon the marble in the show window. He could hardly believe his senses, as he had bought his marble as an original, and here was another original. He went into the shop and priced the figure. "That's very cheap," he remarked. "I must explain to you," said the dealer, "that it has been broken and repaired." He pointed out the faint lines showing where the pieces had been joined and then the former owner recognized his property. He couldn't claim it, as he had once ordered it thrown away. Neither could he accuse the servant of theft. He bought the marble and took it home with him, and the manservant nearly fainted when he saw it in its old place on the mantel.—Chicago Record.

A Baron Newsboy.

One of the most interesting characters in a way in Chicago is said to be a "newsboy" who bears the title of baron and one of the proudest names in northern Germany. He is Baron Richard von Sydow. Every day Von Sydow goes his rounds with a bundle of papers so big that he can hardly carry it, for he is 70 years old now and has lost the vim that distinguished him as a young lieutenant years ago in the Blucher hussars in his native land. He is the son of General William von Sydow, who fought at the battle of Waterloo. He is also connected by marriage with the family of the Princess Bismarck. The baron, when a young man, was a guest at the marriage of the ex-chancellor and loves to tell what a fine, stalwart, popular fellow Herr von Bismarck was in those days. Von Sydow, it is said, tiring of the life at home on a small pittance, came to this country in 1861 and served as a captain in the famous Twelfth Illinois cavalry. He took up service again in Prussia, but soon came back to America, where, however, he has had difficulty in getting along.—New York Tribune.

A Way That Snobs Have.

The premier of Canada, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, is a self made man and snobs can never forgive one who is not indebted to his ancestors for all he possesses. Sir Mackenzie, it seems, was, when a boy, a "printer's devil," and at a banquet given in his honor a guest took the opportunity to insult him by repeating the following verse, a bad imitation of the celebrated lines in "Pinafore:"

> When I was a lad I served my term
> As junior imp in a printing firm.
> I washed the windows, swept the floor
> And daubed the ink on the office door.
> I did it all so thoroughly
> That now I am premier and K. C. M. G.

The premier answered quietly that in one particular the versifier was in error, "for," said he, "I never daubed ink on the door of the office."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Sultan and Turkey's Balance.

The sultan is not quite such a fool as our newspapers take him to be. I remember Fuad Pasha, the last of Turkish statesmen, observing to me many years ago: "Turkey is a chariot to which the great European powers are harnessed. When one tries to pull one way, I flick up the others, who at once pull the other way. Thus the equilibrium of the chariot is secured."—London Truth.

OH, SWEET!

> Oh, sweet beneath this tree to lie
> And watch with wide incurious eye
> The broken glimpses of the sky
> And where the sunlight through the leaves
> A subtle flickering broidery weaves,
> To hear the low eternal sigh
> Of happy winds in tree tops high
> Or gnats hung in a wavering cloud,
> Now far and faint, now near and loud;
> Or bees that quickly come and go
> On noisy errands to and fro;
> To see the swallows far, far up,
> Like motes in heaven's azure cup;
> To lounge and lie with dreamy eye
> And feel the world go whirling round,
> And half in sleep to hear the sound
> Of winds that shake the tree tops high.

TREACHEROUS REDSKINS.

Experience Shows It Is Not Safe to Trust the Indians.

Lieutenant Thomas Cruse was in command of a company of Indian scouts in the summer of 1880 in Arizona. They were White mountain Apaches and had been under him for over a year. Throughout this period, which was a stormy one for the Arizona troops, these Indians had been good soldiers and were faithful to the service in shooting down their own race and showing absolute loyalty to Uncle Sam.

Lieutenant Cruse was often complimented on the spirit which his Indians exhibited, when those under other officers were constantly proving disloyal. It isn't betraying a confidence to say that Cruse was a little vain over his redskin cavalrymen, and he didn't hesitate to give his brother officers a "tip" occasionally as to how to manage them.

"Just take them into your confidence, so to speak," Cruse would say, "and show them that you have faith in their loyalty." The lieutenant was thoroughly honest in giving this advice.

For more than a year he has been in command of these Apaches. He fought side by side with them, shared their dangers, ate with them and slept with them, and they had always been as true as steel.

Not long after Cruse had been giving pointers about how to manage the Apaches the Messiah craze took hold of the Indians of Arizona and the old time loyalty gave way to Indian superstitions. Troop A stood by Cruse well enough, but he was too familiar with the Indian character to mistake the sullen look that showed itself in the faces of the redskins. He asked that they be discharged and Mojave Indians put in their places. This was not done, and on Aug. 30, 1881, without a word Troop A broke away from the United States service and joined the hostiles at Cibicu creek.

The battle which followed this revolt is a familiar story in army circles. Two or three days after the unceremonious departure of Troop A, 500 Indians swept down on two troops of Uncle Sam's cavalry, and it looked for awhile as though there would be a repetition of the Custer tragedy, but by daring heroism the brave cavalrymen cut their way through the circling band of redskins and made their escape with only ten men killed, though at least a score were badly wounded.

"Never trust a redskin as far as you can throw a bull by the tail," is the way the lieutenant put it a few days later when we were discussing the tragedy of his former trusted comrades.—Washington Post.

Paris Cafe Waiter's Tale of Wrong.

The Paris cafe waiter has been throwing himself upon what, owing to his failure to appreciate where the sympathy comes in, he somewhat fondly hopes may prove a sympathetic public, with his tale of wrong. He is, he says, neither paid nor fed nor slaked by his employer. So far from that, he pays his employer, and is fain to feed and slake himself into the bargain. Moreover, he pays his employer every morning, in advance, 5 per cent upon the sale price of the consommations he has got to work off in the course of the day. To recoup himself he must look to his tips, and till he has been tipped to the amount of 5 shillings, his profits do not begin to run. When they do begin, however, they must needs run to something considerable, seeing that there is a brisk competition for every vacancy in the ranks of his profession.

It follows, therefore, that it is really the public who pays all concerned, and the public is thus likely to keep its sympathy for itself. Of course, if it withheld its tips also, the waiter would have to be paid and provisioned by the cafe proprietor. But then, the public shrewdly surmises, the prices of its consommations would be put up, and, though tipping might come into the fashion again, the price would never come down. It naturally prefers the indirect contribution as it is.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Terrible Cockatrice.

The explanation of the origin of that remarkable organism, the cockatrice, leaves nothing to be desired as regards accuracy of detail. We are told that "when the cock is past 7 years old an egg grows within him, whereat he greatly wonders." We can well imagine the dismay of any well conducted masculine bird of that age on finding himself in such a compromising predicament, but how did he communicate his feelings to the historian? That the embryonic cockatrice had some mysterious power of self advertisement is evident, for we hear further that "a toad privily watches him and examines the nest every day to see if the egg be yet laid. When the toad finds the egg, he rejoices much, and at length hatches it, bringing forth an animal with the head, neck and breast of a cock, and from thence downward the body of a serpent."—Westminster Review.

Queer Case.

"The durndest case of snake bite I ever knowed of," said the man with the ginger beard, "was a feller out in Ioway that got bit by one of them prairie rattlers. Well, you know that ef a man drinks enough whisky he thinks he sees snakes, but this here feller, bein bit by a snake, imagines he was full of whisky and bilin drunk. Next day they run him out of town"

"What fer?" asked the grocer.

"'Cause he kilt the snake, of course. The durn fool could of made a mint of money out'n that snake in Ioway ef he only knowed it."—Indianapolis Journal.
