PARTING.
 My life closed twice before its close.
 It yet remains to see
 If immortality unveil
 A third event to me,
 So huge, so hopeless to conceive
 As this that twice befell.
 Parting is all we know of heaven
 And all we need of hell.
 —Edgar Dickinson in Scribner's.

TWO MEN AND A MAID.

"Why don't you tell Louis of his cousin's persistent attention to you?" asked Mme Dupuis of her daughter Hortense as they stood opposite each other before their easels copying two of the old paintings in the Louvre gallery.
 "Why should I annoy Louis, who is quite jealous enough without any provocation?" said Hortense.
 "Julius is a lazy, incompetent, unworthy fellow," remarked the mother, "and will not earn all his life as much as Louis makes in a year."
 "For Jules! He cannot sell his pictures," said Hortense.
 "Louis had no such ambitions," exclaimed Mme Dupuis. "His mother pleaded him in an office when he was 15. Now he is only 20, and he is the confidential manager of Henri Constant & Co., with an income of 20,000 francs, the chance of making as much more with his own commerce and the prospect of becoming a partner. On the other hand, his rascal of a cousin never thinks of beginning a picture which he has got a Napoleon left from the sale of his previous one."
 Hortense merely said, "Poor Jules!" and went on with her painting.

Mme Dupuis was a widow with a moderate amount of rents, which she and Hortense augmented by painting copies of the old masters in the Louvre for English and American tourists, who were more inclined to buy such under the empire than they seem to be now that France has a republican form of government, though why constitutional changes should not upon the independent rule of art is difficult to say.
 A few months from that morning, when Hortense and her mother were talking over their work, the world was to see the beginning of that great crisis from which France has not yet recovered. The terrors of conscription are only truly emphasized when the hazard of the drawing is really a game of life and death, when the augmentation of a country's soldiers is rendered needful by the turbulence of war. Such was the case in France, on the eve of the Franco-German struggle. All the reserves were called out, and the empire prepared for the mighty combat with its redoubtable antagonist.

Julius Lemolne walked into the office of his cousin Louis. His visits had been rare enough at the bureau of his prosperous relative, whose success embittered the feelings of his needy and irregular cousin, but Louis had never quite broken off association with the painter.
 "Good morning, M. Louis," said Jules somewhat flippantly. "I have dared to intrude upon your valuable moments to bid you goodby."
 "Goodby!" echoed Louis inquiringly as he looked up from his correspondence.
 "Have you some commission abroad?"
 "I have a commission to paint the fields of Germany blood red," answered Jules heartily. "At least," he added, "I have no commission, being only of the rank and file, but that is the work I am going to execute."
 "Oh, yes," said Louis; "you were drawn two years ago."
 "Our corps is now called out, and I join tomorrow," explained Jules. "I think you paid for a substitute."
 "Yes," answered the other; "it was not such an expensive proceeding then as it would be now. I am surprised that you did not study your convenience in the same way."

"I had no money to spare," said Jules. "Besides, what did it matter to me whether I was handling a brush or wielding a rifle? A poor beggar with nothing to live for may console himself that he has a country to die for."
 "A country gains by a citizen's life, not by his death. A man who extends the commerce of his fellow countrymen into foreign markets is more of a patriot than he who writes his country's name in blood upon the stranger's soil."
 "At any rate, his life is more comfortable and remunerative," said Jules. "As for myself, Mme Dupuis has made life valuable for me."
 Louis' eyes flashed for an second; then the lids fell, and he replied quietly:
 "I do not see how Mme Dupuis can have affected your life."
 "Do you wish to see, Louis Lemolne?" asked the other. "In the same way that you have done, you have blighted my life in thwarting my love."
 "Please do not talk nonsense," said Louis. "Do you think that your love was hindered in its fulfillment by either Mme Dupuis or myself? Do you think that a young lady like Hortense, whose existence has never been in discord with the refinements of her social surroundings, could ally herself with— He was about to say "a vagabond," but he corrected himself and added, "A Bohemian like you?"
 "She may not have the same contempt for me that you have for your father's nephew," said Jules. "Well, it does not matter much now, at any rate for the present. We shall see if I return with my shield or upon it. Meanwhile do not think that you know all the secrets of Hortense's heart."

Then he strode out of the office, leaving his cousin with another sudden accession of passion, which only cooled down into suspicion and discontent.
 What secrets did Hortense confide to Jules which she did not tell her lover? This she has enabled this man to boast of an intimacy which she ought not to have accorded to him.
 He would have questioned Hortense on the subject that very day, but she and her mother had gone to England on a visit to a relative who had made that country his home. He did not care to write to her on such an immediate statement as that suggested by Jules, who, after all, might be gossiped by some who, after all, might be applied to himself so the details of commerce once more and tried to forget his previous annoyances.
 The next morning Jules, decked in his regimentals, entered his cousin's office again. He was flushed and excited and had evidently been plugging his friends of the studio in sending them goodby.

"I have brought that letter from Hortense," he said as he laid a paper upon Louis' table.
 For a moment Louis was about to return it to Jules unread, but his jealousy checked his good impulses, and he opened and read the note which his cousin had brought. As Louis grasped the meaning of the words he turned pale, but, controlling his feelings as he handed the paper back to his cousin, he merely said:
 "Such a confidence, I think, should hardly have been placed in a man who can so readily violate it."

 Then he turned his back upon Jules, who strutted out with a tipsy defiance and prepared himself for his departure to join his corps by a few more farewell glasses with his friends.
 This, then, was the secret of Hortense which he had then learned. Her love was for Jules, but her mother had compelled her to accept the rich cousin and repulse the poor one. Should he write to Hortense and uphold her for her insincerity? How could he do so when he had hardly respected himself in reading the letter unaddressed to him?
 Each moment that he thought of the faithlessness of Hortense augmented his anger and caused a desperate craving for action. The next morning he informed Constant & Co. that he must retire from his office, as it was his intention to join the ranks of the French army as a private soldier.
 "My dear Lemolne," said Henri Constant, "this is simply quixotic. The war is not one of self defense, but one of ambition."
 Louis was resolute, however, in his plan of action.
 "Well," sighed Henri Constant, "if you are decided, there's an end. We must give you a year's leave, though goodness knows how we shall conduct the business without you."
 Louis smiled bitterly.

In the last year of the empire, as in the final days of the previous one, haste and precipitation took the place of care and caution. The soldiers were rushed through their drills with as little attention as was applied to their kits, the one object in view being that of having a large army to take the field as soon as war should have been declared. The provisions indispensable for the campaign were considered as duly supplied on the strength of those official returns which were accepted as unimpeachable, the supplies of the ammunition itself being almost taken as a matter of course.
 All this was too soon realized before the fatal month of August had but little more than half run its course, each day bringing the outnumbered Frenchmen nearer to their doom in the disastrous year of 1870. The defeat of Gravelotte and Rezonville had compelled the retreat of the forces into Metz, leaving many of the wounded to the promiscuous attention of the victors. Without asserting that they were worse cared for than were those wounded on the conquering side, it is certain that the French soldiers who were left on the field had a very bad time of it. In the crowded shelters which were improvised as hospitals, the symptoms of those fatal developments quickly doomed their sufferers to the inferno over which might have been written the dread warning, "Abandon hope, all ye that enter here."
 Among this crowd of the doomed victims of the last of empire and the pride of power were two French soldiers hurried in with the rest. One had suffered amputation of both his legs; the other had been the victim of a breast contusion, caused from the fragments of an exploding shell, and was in peril from the shock rather than from the gravity of the effects of the wound, which could not be considered serious.
 In any case he had been brought to that pesthouse hastily and improperly, for there was no sign of gangrene or blood poisoning in his symptoms.
 As the former rolled his head from side to side upon the straw spread over the earth of the shed where he lay, his eyes fell upon the form of his neighbor.
 "Heavens!" he exclaimed. "Am I mad? Louis Lemolne, for he you must be, how do I find you a comrade in this accursed place?"
 For a moment the other was struck silent in his astonishment.
 "Julius," he at last gasped, "do we meet under such a cloud of misery? What you revealed to me made life unendurable, and the day after you left me I volunteered in the service to which I had already supplied a substitute. I wanted to die."
 The heaving chest of Jules, who was past all physical suffering, betrayed a mental torture.
 "Louis," he stammered, "forgive me. I shall soon have to plead for pardon elsewhere. I was envious of all your good fortune. I felt that but for you Hortense might be mine. When I saw you so safe and prosperous and happy, the devil got possession of my heart. I went away and wrote the letter which I showed you. It was not written by Hortense. I used one of her notes to me to copy her writing. It was a forgery."
 As if suddenly electrified, Louis sprang from the straw with the impulse of vengeance in his soul. But as he looked at the poor, dying wretch, who was of the same blood as his, compassion conquered anger, and stooping down he kissed him and whispered, "I forgive."
 It was only in time. The excitement had exhausted the little strength of the moribund soldier, who sank down in his wretched bed, closing his life with penitence and confusion. Like a dreaming man, Louis left this Walhalla of misery, where the heroes changed their shouts for wailing and a patriot to dying groans and shrieks of agony. No one took much account of those hopeless men, and thus Louis emerged from the place unnoticed and mixed with others who were prisoners like himself, wounded and hors de combat, awaiting the outcome of events which they could no longer influence. If all had such heavy grief at heart as he had, heaven help them!

More than a year had passed when Mme Dupuis and her daughter returned to Paris to find their home wrecked during the rule of the commune and at last to put themselves in communication with their own countrymen. They had heard from Henri Constant, in reply to their inquiry, that Louis had joined the army, but the disorders of the year had prevented any further communication with him.
 "I regret, ladies," said Henri Constant, "that we have no news of Lemolne. He was missing after Gravelotte, and I fear that he must have been left upon the field of battle."
 As Hortense heard the words that doomed her life, the color left her cheek and she would have swooned on the floor had she not been caught in the arms of Louis, who entered that moment.
 "Ah, Louis," she said, "where have you been and why is it that you have kept silent so long a time?"
 "Dearest," he whispered, "it is a secret of the dead. M. Constant," he went on, "I have been a double prisoner, held by illness and the enemy. I have exceeded my leave, I am afraid, but I won't care for another until I am married."—Spare Moments.

 SALEM, Nov. 9.—The annual Thanksgiving proclamation was today issued by Governor Lord. The proclamation in full is as follows:
 "For the manifold blessings vouchsafed to us during the past year, it is fitting that we, as a grateful people, should make due acknowledgments to Almighty God. In recognition of this duty, and in conformity with the time-honored custom, and in accordance with the proclamation of the President of the United States, I, William P. Lord, governor of the state of Oregon, do designate and set apart Thursday, the 28th day of November, 1896, as Thanksgiving day.
 "On that day I recommend that the people abstain, as far as practicable, from the occupations of every-day life, and that they assemble in their usual places of worship and offer praise and thanksgiving to God for the peace and prosperity bestowed upon us, for the health and happiness with which he has blessed us, and for our freedom from pestilence and calamities. Let us also devote the day to the enjoyment of hospitality and the strengthening of family ties; to relieving the wants of the needy and distressed, and the doing of charitable deeds; to inspiring sentiments of loyalty to our country, and respect for its laws and the maintenance of public order; to cultivating a just regard for the rights and opinions of others, and inculcating a sense of duty that will lead us to fulfill as far as lies in our power, our obligations as citizens and individuals."
