Robbed the Grave.

A startling incident, of which Mr. John Oliver of Philadelphia, was the subject, is narrated by him as follows: 'I was in a most dreadful condition My skin was almost yellow, eyes sunken, tongue coated, pain continually in back and sides; no appetite—gradually growing weaker day by day. Three physicians had given me up Fortunately a friend advised trying 'Electric Bitters,' and to my great joy and surprise, the first bottle made a decided improvement. I continued their use for three weeks, and am now a well man. I know they saved my life and robbed the grave of another victim." No one should fail to try them. Only 50cts, guaranteed at W L DeLano's drug store.

An Epidemic of Whooping Cough

Last winter during an epidemic of whooping cough my children contracted the disease, having severe coughing spells. We had used Chamberlain's Cough Remedy very successfully for croup and naturally turned to it at that time and found it relieved the cough and effected a complete cure.—John E Clifford, Proprietor Norwood House, Norwood, N Y. This remedy is for sale by W L DeLano.

IN THE ORCHARD.

Down in the orchard, where the leaves
Play hide and seek all day,
I crossed the web the shadow weaves
And came where Doris lay.
Her arms were crossed above her hair,
Her eyes were curtained close,
And on her lip her dreams bloomed fair
As on her cheek the rose.

The little rosy apples leaned
Between the leaves to see;
The blackbird, by the pear bough screened,
Exchanged a glance with me;
The sunshine strove to part the boughs
And kiss her sleeping eyes,
But I turned back toward the house,
For I, for once, was wise!
—Pall Mall Gazette.

A MELODY.

It United a Pair of Lovers That Had Been Estranged.

By Ina Brevoort Roberts.

Copyright, 1900, by Ervin Wardman.

It was about half past 9 when Jack Sutherland wandered into a roof garden, less because he cared to be there than because he could think of nothing else to do.

There had been a time when Jack's evenings were not spent in an aimless endeavor to make the hours fly faster, but that time was past.

The orchestra was crashing out the music of a comic opera as he stepped from the elevator, and he leisurely scanned the crowd that sat in groups around small tables sipping iced drinks.

All day the heat had been terrific, and even now, although a breeze stirred the foliage of the potted plants, a humid haze still lingered in the air and mellowed the rays of the colored lamps that only partly dispelled the darkness.

Their light was sufficient to catch the glitter in the jewels of the women nearest them, but there were nooks where the friendly darkness shielded the faces of lovers and encouraged tender confidences.

As Jack passed a number of these couples on his way to a seat he turned his eyes impatiently toward the center of the inclosure where that part of the audience had congregated which had come to find amusement and forget the heat.

There the murmur of voices mingling with the music was continuous, and the deep tones of prosperous looking business men blended with the low laughter of women who, despite the heat, looked cool and fresh in their filmy gowns.

Jack nodded to one or two people as he dropped into a seat. A waiter came for his order, and after he had given it Jack lighted a cigar and, leaning back, proceeded to take note of the groups at the tables nearest him. It was one of his ways of obtaining diversion, this studying of the people about him. He liked to watch the play of expression on the various faces and to speculate about them.

He did not, however, enjoy watching lovers. Jack had a fine contempt for sentiment. His one love affair had been full of it, and it had ended badly. But that he had quite outlived his love and even his slight feeling of bitterness toward the woman who had been able to cause him so much pain Jack often assured himself.

Thoughts of Edith brought no accompanying heartache, and his feelings for her now resembled the calm regard we entertain toward friends of former days from whom we have parted. But the affair had left him with a cynical dislike of anything that bordered on sentiment.

It amused him to think how rich in the thing he now despised the days of his courtship and short engagement had been. Edith has told him once, with a pretty flush on her cheeks and a light in her eyes, that the sight of violets always would recall to her mind the time when he had asked her to be his wife.

She had worn those flowers that evening—a monstrous bunch of them that he had sent her—and Jack remembered how their perfume had filled the tiny drawing room and in some indefinable way had seemed to blend with the soft light of the shaded lamps.

It was pretty, that love affair of theirs, but, after all, it had been only an episode. He was glad that they had discovered their mistake in time, and he was able to look back upon that portion of his life much as we remember a dainty play that lifts us for a time above the sordid cares of the workaday world.

In the time he had known her Edith had roused him from his indifferent attitude toward life. He always must feel grateful to her for that, Jack told himself, but the sight of violets brought him no regrets.

The return of the waiter with the drink he had ordered roused Jack from his contemplation of an interesting group near him. The orchestra had brought the blatant music of the opera to a close and was playing an alluring waltz.

The waltz died away on the summer air, and the murmur of voices became louder, interspersed with the popping of corks and the sound of ice against thin glass.

Jack's gaze returned to the scene before him, and it was at this moment that he caught sight of Edith seated at a table a few feet from him.

He had not seen her since they parted as friends a year before, and he smiled to think that he should be able to look at her now with so little perturbation. He did not believe she knew that he was there. At any rate she gave no sign of having seen him, and Jack watched her at intervals as the figures between them swayed.

Apparently she was well and happy. Their brief love affair had passed over the surface of her life and left no ripple. Jack looked at her critically, noting her beauty and the taste displayed in her attire. He always had admired her dainty way of dressing, and as for her beauty, that was undeniable. It impressed him no less vividly now than it had in those other days when he adored her.

Suddenly, without any premonitory tuning of instruments, the orchestra broke into a catchy air that brimmed over with contagious jollity and sent a ripple of merriment running through the audience.

A queer ripple came over Jack's face as he smiled with the others. That little melody was full of memories for him. No matter how completely a thing of the past his love for Edith might be, that tune always must bring her to his mind.

There was nothing sentimental about it. It was too frankly gay for that, but it had nevertheless woven itself inextricably through all their courtship. It began with their first quarrel, an assumption of authority on his part, unwarrantable as he looked at it now, and a flaunting of pride on hers.

The next evening they had met in a box at the theater and had avoided each other's eyes until the orchestra struck up that air, which by its infectious gayety had dispelled their ill humor and caused them to look at one another and smile. After that they never heard it that their eyes did not meet with a look of understanding. It had ended many quarrels for them.

"When you can hear that air played without meeting my eyes, I shall know that you no longer love me," Jack once had said to Edith half in jest.

The melody in question, chancing to strike the keynote of public favor, became popular, and they heard it everywhere. Sometimes in a pretty attempt at defiance Edith resolutely would keep her eyes averted and refuse to look at her lover, but she never could carry her willfulness to the end of the tune. Always before the music stopped her eyes would meet his gaze.

And this was what the orchestra was playing now, and he and she were sitting only a few feet apart, with their love for each other quite dead. It was an odd coincidence, Jack thought, smiling. How had the old tune, which belonged to a past summer, come to find a place among the popular airs of the present one? There seemed to be some invisible link that connected them—her and him and that fanciful, silly jig. Well, there would be no love message flashed between them this time.

Jack told himself this with no emotion, and his calmness made him realize how completely a thing of the past his love was. He glanced over to where she sat. The crowd had thinned out, and he could see her plainly now.

If the music stirred memories in Edith, the fact did not show in her face. Her eyes were lowered, but her lips smiled as she listened to what her companion was saying.

Suddenly she raised her head and met Jack's gaze. Whether she had seen him before he did not know, but as she looked her smile faded, and for a few seconds the two regarded each other steadily, gravely.

Then just as the music stopped something in the man's face brought the girl's smile back again, not to her lips this time, but in her eyes, and Jack knew that she had not forgotten. He knew, too, that his pretense at not caring had been a farce and that he loved her still.

It was as a man in a dream that he saw Edith rise and move toward the exit, followed by her escort. Jack also rose, and in the confusion, as a crowd filled the elevator, he managed to speak to her.

"When can I see you?" he asked.

"Tomorrow," she answered without looking at him.

The elevator stopped, and they were separated again, but as Jack lighted a fresh cigar and went on his homeward way life had a different look, and the clatter of horses' feet as cabs darted swiftly over the smooth asphalt beat time to a glad refrain that echoed and re-echoed in his heart, "Tomorrow, tomorrow, tomorrow!"—New York Press.

No Mystery About Politics.

There is nothing peculiar or mysterious about politics or international relations, says Henry D. Sedgwick, Jr., in The Atlantic. When two or three men live within hail of one another, political relations begin. Politics begin when men realize that other men are forces to be considered. Men meet, bow; each drives his wagon to the right; one sells, another buys; they fence their acres in. They meet together to chop down a tree, to mend the road, to regulate county matters with the next community.

Whether they like it or not, politics have begun; ethical relations have begun; religion has come in. Be it fear, philosophy, instinct or habit, every normal man is conscious of this religious element. Men cannot separate politics from ethics nor ethics from religion; they are threefold, yet one and indivisible. From that union springs the normal law.

Rightly to understand that power is the chief problem of life, and mankind has long been busy at the task, but the immediate matter for men is to understand that what is true of two men and three gathered together is true of tens of millions. Are men to recognize this power which acts on the individual and on society only when the company is small and they can see the whites of each other's eyes? The duty of the state is to recognize the scientific truth of the universality and persistence of this power and to put it to use in state affairs.

Quite Natural.

Little Johnny—Mamma, let's play I am your mother and you are my little boy.

Mamma—Very well, dear. How shall we play it?

Little Johnny—I'll tell you. You start to do something, and I'll tell you not to.
