SATURDAY - DECEMBER 1

1776 AND 1900?

Those Dutchmen down in South Africa don't stay whipped. It is not without cause that Great Britain is alarmed. The marked sympathy of the French and German populace for the Boer cause is especially disquieting. South Africa is a big country, and the inhabitants are almost a unit against British rule. The torch that Cecil Rhodes lit when he enlisted the aid of Great Britain to capture the Kimberley diamond mines started a conflagration that it seems will cost the British lion no little prestige, not to speak of dear blood and treasure.

From the present outlook it needs no prophet to foretell the eventual triumph of the Boer republics. It will be a case of history repeating itself. Yet 1776 and 1900 are a long way apart.

HOW JACKSON'S WORDS BECAME HISTORIC.

The famous expression of President Jackson, "By the Eternal, this nation must and shall be preserved" first found popular expression in a cartoon, and it is doubtful if the stormy words would have become so prominent in the traditions of the country if it had not been for the cartoon showing the proud Calhoun bowing for pardon before the imperious "Old Hickory."

There is something of the spirit of gallantry in the portraits represented in the cartoons of seventy years ago. The features were not coarsely distorted as today, but were made easily recognizable and as true a likeness as a daguerrotype could furnish. Even in the manner of dress, the "olaw hammer" attire was always maintained punctiliously.

THE SATURDAY COLLECTION DAY NUISANCE.

"Impressions," in this morning's Register, tells some good business truth. He says: "When the first of the month comes on Saturday it ought to be a rule of the merchants in Eugene that collections go over until Monday. This would be a convenience to all kinds of business on the busiest day of the week. So far as the Register is concerned this will be our rule from now on, and we would like to see it generally adopted. The only collections made tomorrow will be by our carriers for daily subscriptions, many of which are paid at the homes where one pay-day is as convenient as another."

A LITTLE FABLE.

A Beautiful young lady, being engaged to a Handsome young man, sought to reform him. "I observe," she said that you are addicted to the foolish habit of smoking. Do you not think that you should stop it? It would be so much better for you if you did. Besides, you would save money."

"Yes, indeed," replied the handsome young man. "And I perceive that you are a slave to the chocolate caramel habit, which is not only ruinous to the digestion, but expensive. Don't you think you should stop it, also?"

Whereupon she wept and said he was a hateful thing, and broke the engagement. Moral—It is not always the largest feet that are pinched the most.—Josh Wink, in Baltimore American.

Lieutenant Russell B. Harrison, son of his father, has been dropped from the army. Earnest personal appeals to the secretary of war and president failed to save his official scalp. Harrison had no training for the army, and was unjustly advanced over others who stood in line for promotion. It was a clear case of being a son of the father.

Binghamton, New York, has a very serious joke. Two sisters and a cousin recently became mothers at about the same time. For a joke the babies were dressed alike and shown to the fathers of one of them as alleged triplets. Now the mothers don't know which is which.

It is not that the French love Kruger much, but that they hate England more which explains the great reception given the ex-president of the Transvaal.

A FLIRTATION FIGURE

After a hurried introduction, in which I did not catch her name, I found myself gliding over the polished floor with one of those exquisite dancers whom a Providence especially manufactures to bring a few moments of happiness into the life of a man. It was the perfection of movement.

When the music stopped, we seated ourselves in a little recess which nestled at the side of the corridor. Although we had never met before, we seemed friends of a lifetime. We discussed our fellow creatures as they passed before us along the corridor or wandered arm in arm round the ballroom. It is the way of friends of a lifetime.

"There is the brute who did this," she said, raising her dress an inch and a half—out it might have been two inches—showing a torn blouse and what I observed more closely, an exquisite foot.

"Clumsy lot!" I murmured. She smiled at me. Her teeth were perfect.

I fancied I saw him with you just now. Do you know him?" she asked.

"Not from Adam," I said angrily. He happened to be my brother—but, then, I never knew Adam.

We watched the revolving couples for a few moments of silence; then I felt a light touch on my arm.

"Do look at that man," she said. "Isn't he ridiculous? He hangs over the girl as if he were going to kiss her. Poor thing!"

"Ah, they do that sometimes—at a dance," said I, with a smothered sigh—not smothered too much, though.

"Do not do that, a dance, surely. It is a quaint custom, this kissing." My fair companion spoke as if her thoughts were far away. I was glad it was only her thoughts.

I ventured to lightly touch her arm. It was an exquisite arm.

"A penny for your thoughts," I exclaimed.

"They are not issued in a cheap edition," she said, with a little laugh.

"You are thinking of—of that custom?" I suggested.

"Yes, I was—of my first experience of it."

"Ah!" I said. "There was a world of meaning in that."

"Don't look like that. I was only 10 years old. He was 12. I had a new dress on—pink one—and, oh, so short! He was looking at my umbrella over me, and the stick got in the way, and he hurt me!"

"A stick in the way?" said I.

"There would have been more than nine, I think."

Her voice was filled with the passion of a vain regret.

"He was such an ugly boy, too," she added. "He certainly had become a man by that time."

"Why?" I inquired, a little surprised.

"We women do not flirt with ugly men. We marry them."

"Are you always in earnest, then, with ugly men?" I asked anxiously.

"My friends do not call me handsome."

But she only smiled, which was not a very satisfactory answer.

We were looking across the corridor into the room beyond, watching the crowd of whirling figures, when a man walked slowly by us. I noticed my companion glance at him and then shrink round to the corner of the room. I wondered and felt strangely annoyed. I remarked that he seemed dangerous, as he was certainly ugly.

"He is perhaps a little ungainly," she said, "but, then, so many men are like that. Now, take your own carriage."

A Thank Offering

Betty has a weakness for dressing the part, and when I found her last Tuesday afternoon arrayed in a blue, floppy, artistic garment and an air of pensiveness I shuddered. I was almost sure that she had offended the cook. She finds it rather hard to be properly respectful toward the potentate. But to a cook who has talent and in the matter of savory possibilities genius much may be forgiven. Sautes are not to be despised. I sighed.

"Oh, such a beautiful!" she moaned by way of greeting.

It was the cook.

"When's she going?" I asked gloomily.

"It's a funny thing," she said. "I don't know. Not that sort of luncheon, you stupid old boy. Cook's not leaving."

"Oh, well," I said in a relieved tone, "if you will play tricks with your digestion!"

She stopped me with an indignant glance.

"Dick Ferris lunched with me," she remarked.

"Dick Ferris?" I whistled.

"Do not make that foolish noise," with great dignity. "Yes, with Dick Ferris. What of it?"

"I began confusedly."

"Don't call me 'my dear.' I do not live in the suburbs. I had quite enough of that at luncheon time."

"You don't mean to tell me, madam, that Ferris called you 'my dear'?"

"Of course not. It would not have been so bad if he had. He talked to me as if I were 50—and plain."

"Why, I thought he used to—"

"What?" And she regarded me a trifle more hopefully.

"Well—long ago—"

"Not so very long ago," she murmured.

"Eustace says," I persisted. "I—well, he was one of the—followers."

"I'm not cook," she laughed. "But it is true. He did—follow, and he has been supposed to be breaking his heart in some outlandish place."

"Ah, I understand," I said brilliantly.

"His heart is whole again, and you don't."

Again I was withered by a look.

"Am I that kind of person?" she demanded wrathfully. "Don't I always try to marry off the friends of my unattractive days?"

"Well, perhaps." But she doesn't really like to get married. I think she does help on the process. I notice that the girls are never wildly enthusiastic over her.

"No, it wasn't that at all. You are altogether wrong."

"Certainly," I conceded politely. "I never thought it was that. But what was it, then?"

"He has changed so abominably," she said vigorously. "He has become so conventional, so narrow, so—so suburban. Very different from the Dick I—"
