TWO OLD LADIES.

By BARRY PAIN.

Age had quieted the whole house. There was not a restless fashion in it anywhere. The love of things as they were linked itself with a gentle and far from bitter disregard for things as they are. The room was beautiful, but not because anybody had tried to be artistic in the Tottenham Court road. Its sweet and rather quaint simplicity had grown up unconsciously.

The mistress of the house sat in a straight backed chair by the fire. She [illegible] beautiful and serene old lady, [illegible] abundance of white hair. [illegible] to her guest, "the [illegible] winter and the [illegible] and yet you drove over [illegible] word to a lonely old woman [illegible] birthday. It was [illegible] of [illegible]

[illegible] but [illegible] accustomed to give orders [illegible]

"[illegible] selfish," she said; "I want to see you, my dear. You are just the person, Alice, that people who are out of temper ought to come and see. (I sacked three of 'em this morning.) The birthday was an excuse. We can't wish each other many happy returns any more, you know."

"No," said Alice placidly. "We can just hope we may last out another year. And it's very pleasant to live, to have a nice house and to be able to go about it and see to things. Then there are Tommy and the Quakeress. I want to enjoy my grandchildren as long as I can. The Quakeress is really the primmest and quaintest baby you ever saw in your life. I keep note in a book of the things that she says. Life is very enjoyable as long as one is healthy."

"Glad to hear it," said Agatha rather snappishly. "Still, would you have enjoyed flat monotony when you were a girl of 20?"

"One cannot have grandchildren when one is 20," said Alice thoughtfully. "Luckily the temperament changes with the years. At 20 I loved changes and movement and excitement, and I could have them. Now I only want things to be the way that I have got used to them. I love my old servants, and a new tea service—I do believe that it would break my heart; it would certainly keep me awake at night."

"Ah," said Agatha, "you've got the secret of it, and I've not, and it is my belief that the women over 50 who have not got it ought to be taken out and shot. My dear, if I had not been a believing Christian I should have taken my own life long before this."

"Please do not say that."

"You're quite right. One ought not to say these things, and, at the same time, one cannot help thinking them. I've no enjoyments left except the rare pleasure of seeing old friends."

"But one makes one's enjoyments. They may mostly consist of sympathetic interest in the enjoyments of others, but what does that matter? At our time of life one must expect to become a spectator."

"I've heard it all before. In the library at home I've got books about old age. They must have been written by people who were very young. I hate consolations; they never console. And how on earth am I to make my enjoyments?"

"There are so many old people about who are much less fortunate than we are. If one helps them a little"—

"One is always treated with ingratitude."

"Now, do you know," said the serene old lady, "I don't think that that matters much to the enjoyment. A little imagination is all that is wanted. You put yourself in their place, and think how you would feel if you were in want of proper food or a cup of good tea and somebody gave you it. They are just awkward in expressing things. With a little imagination you can do the gratitude yourself and never trouble them."

"What a marvel you are! I do believe that if somebody kicked you you would hunt up some reason or other to prove that you deserved it and in any case would say that the sensation was far from unpleasant. I know you, Alice."

"I always valued things for making me happy without asking questions. But you have the superior mind—always had."

Agatha murmured a disclaimer, looking hard into the bright fire before her.

There was a pause, and then the placid old lady said almost timidly, "Did you say that you had sent three of them away?"

"Three servants? Certainly."

"And what was it, dear?"

"Breakfast six minutes late. I don't exaggerate. One put the blame on another, and the second put it on a third. So I told them they could all go."

"Quite right," said Alice warmly. "That will be a lesson to them. You will find them punctual in future."

"Somebody else will," said Agatha dryly.

"I hope so—everybody in your house will. A good warning is a grand thing."

"It's not a warning; it's dismissal."

"You've not given me a birthday present. Give me a reprieve for those three."

"All right, my dear," said Agatha. "They shall have another chance if they like."

The serene old lady looked jubilant and thanked Agatha warmly. Agatha watched her, reflected and said:

"If you want to enjoy life up to the very last drop, I suppose you've got to be beneficent. And I suppose I'm a devil and ought to be destroyed. Are you coming over to luncheon tomorrow?"

White Man Turned Yellow.

Great consternation was felt by the friends of M A Hogarty of Lexington, Ky, when they saw he was turning yellow. His skin slowly changed color, also his eyes, and he suffered terribly. His malady was Yellow Jaundice. He was treated by the best doctors, but without benefit. Then he was advised to try Electric Bitters, the wonderful Stomach and Liver remedy, and he writes: "After taking two bottles I was wholly cured." A trial proves its matchless merit for all stomach, liver and kidney troubles. Only 50c. Sold by W L DeLano, druggist.
