The Panther's Revenge.

Old Myers, the Panther, was a man of iron constitution, of great power of bone and muscle and an indomitable courage that knew no mixture of fear. He settled in Illinois and soon took a leading part among them. One day when on a hunting excursion with them a river lay in their way which must be crossed at a single point. When they arrived at this point, they suddenly came upon a huge panther, which had taken possession of the pass, and like a skillful general, confident of his strong position, seemed determined to hold it. The party retreated a little and stood at bay for a while and consulted what should be done.

Myers urged the chief, whose rifle was loaded, to march close to the panther and shoot him, promising support if the shot failed, but the chief declined. All the Indians likewise refused a duty almost sure to bring death.

At last Myers, in a burst of anger and impatience, called them all a set of cowards and snatching the loaded rifle from the hands of the chief, to the amazement of the whole party, marched deliberately toward the panther. The Indians kept at a cautious distance to watch the result of the fearful battle. Myers walked steadily up to within about two rods of the panther, keeping his eyes fixed upon him, while the eyes of the panther flashed fire and his heavy growl betokened at once the power and firmness of the animal. At about two rods' distance Myers leveled his rifle, took deliberate aim and fired. The shot inflicted a heavy wound, but not a fatal one, and the furious animal, maddened with the pain, made two leaps before he reached his assailant. Myers met him with the butt end of his rifle and staggered him a little with two or three heavy blows, but the rifle broke, and the animal grappled him apparently with his full power. The Indians at once gave Myers up for dead and only thought of making a timely retreat for themselves.

Fearful was the struggle between Myers and the panther, but the animal had the best of it at first, for they soon came to the ground. Myers underneath, suffering under the joint operation of sharp claws and teeth applied by the most powerful muscles. In falling, however, Myers' right hand was at liberty, and drawing a long knife, as soon as they came to the ground, he cut his arm being free, he made a desperate plunge at the vitals of the animal and, as good luck would have it, he reached his heart. The loud shriek of the panther showed that it was a death wound. He quivered convulsively, shook his victim with a spasmodic leap and plunge, then loosened his hold and fell powerless by his side. Myers, whose wounds were severe, but not mortal, rose to his feet, bleeding and much exhausted, but with life and strength to give a grand whoop which conveyed the news of his victory to his trembling Indian friends.

They now came up to him with shouting and joy and so full of admiration that they were almost ready to worship him. They dressed and bound up his wounds and were now ready to pursue their journey home without the least impediment. Before crossing the river, however, Myers cut off the head of the panther, which he took home with him and fastened it up by the side of his cabin door, where it remained for years, a memorial of a deed that excited the admiration of the Indians in all that region. From that time forth they gave Myers that name and always called him the Panther.

The Black Hawk war broke out, and the Indians murdered Myers' brother-in-law, wife and three children. Myers without a word gripped on his tomahawk and scalping knife and shouldered his loaded rifle and at open midday silently and alone bent his steps toward the Indian encampment. With a fearless and firm tread he marched directly into the midst of the assembly, elevated his rifle at the head of the principal chief present and shot him dead on the spot. He then deliberately severed the head from the trunk, and holding it up by the hair before the awe-stricken multitude, he exclaimed: "You have murdered my brother-in-law, his wife and their little ones, and now I have murdered your chief. I am now even with you. But now mind, every one of you that is found here tomorrow morning at sunrise is a dead Indian."

Believing their chief had fallen a victim to some unseen power, they were stupefied with terror and looked on without even a thought of resistance. Myers bore off the head in triumph to his cabin, where he was welcomed by his anxious friends almost as one returning from the dead. The next morning not an Indian was to be found anywhere in the vicinity. Their camps were deserted, and they left forever their ancient haunts and their dead, and that part of the state was not molested by them afterward.

MILLY'S REVENGE.

Mrs. Somers and her daughter Milly were iceboating in the Snowbird on Chebeco lake, and Milly was aglow with pleasurable excitement. In the midst of a burst of merriment her eye was caught by a boat just putting out from the shore, and a glance at its occupants caused her gay laughter to die away, while her laughing mouth was set in a stern, straight line. He had brought Phoebe Arnold iceboating. All the gloom of the past week settled again on Milly's brow, and a curt nod was her only answer to the greeting from Jack Warren's boat.

A little lump came in Milly's throat as she thought what good friends she and Jack had always been until that unfortunate speech of hers had sent him away in a rage pursued by her mocking laughter—laughter that had given way to a flood of tears almost before the door had closed upon him. That was last Monday night, and all the week Milly had waited for him to come back and forgive her, refusing to believe he could desert her for some other girl, especially Phoebe Arnold, who was one of those helpless girls who faint at the sight of a mouse and cling to a man frantically at the very suggestion of danger.

Milly wondered how Jack could endure such babyish ways, and then as she contemptuously watched Phoebe's pretty, appealing gestures a scheme came into her mind and fixed itself there and would not be driven away. It was unworthy of her, and Milly knew it, but— "I will," she thought, setting her lips even more firmly. "I will give her a fright that will make Phoebe Arnold at so foolish that Jack Warren will never want to look at her again."

Raising her voice, Milly called to the owner of the Argus, who brought his boat up alongside the Snowbird. "Won't you get in and try my boat, Miss Arnold?" she asked cordially. "Papa, please get into Mr. Warren's boat while I take Miss Arnold in here. The Snowbird is much swifter than the Argus and perhaps she would like the change."

Phoebe would have protested. She was an ardent coward, and the Argus was quite fast enough to suit her, but Jack and Mrs. Somers insisted that the change would be a relief after sitting so long in one position, so reluctantly Phoebe stepped aboard the Snowbird, ashamed of her fears and yet feeling instinctively that Milly was not quite so friendly as she appeared.

The Snowbird, sheltered by the shore, went at a very moderate pace at first, but as soon as Phoebe was chatting merrily away in temporary forgetfulness, all auspicious allayed, Milly sent the boat into the open, where in the strong wind the Snowbird, like its namesake, seemed fairly to fly through the air.

"Oh, Miss Somers," exclaimed Phoebe, at last aroused by their rapid flight. "Do stop! I am so frightened!" "I can't," said Milly, bringing the boat up into the wind with such a sharp turn that Phoebe screamed. "Hold on tight!"

The Snowbird, to a novice's eye, was now apparently out of control, but an expert would have seen that Milly's grasp on the tiller was unrelaxed and that Milly's eye measured distances unerringly. Now the boat seemed rushing upon a ledge of rocks and just escaping by a miracle; now she went flying among the other boats so that Phoebe's screams and pleadings for help could be plainly heard.

Milly smiled grimly. To the other boaters, who could see that the Snowbird was merely doing a few ridiculous turns, Phoebe's actions must appear ridiculous. Jack Warren's opinion of her could not be very high now. Milly thought, while his opinion of Milly herself mattered nothing. Doubtless he could not entertain a worse one.

But the height of Milly's folly was yet to appear. At one end of the lake the ice cutters had laid a large area of ice marked out, and where they had been cutting a great gulf of laky black water yawned.

The Snowbird began to fly back and forth over this marked ice, and with each of Phoebe's terrified cries the fire of revenge burned fiercer in Milly's breast.

Nearer and nearer the edge of the black opening the Snowbird circled, and then Milly's excited brain spun round and round, the main sheet slipped from her nervous fingers, and the Snowbird, carried along by her own impulse, plunged into a tremendous splash into the dark water, half filled, rolled helplessly a moment, and then righted herself and lay floating on the surface of the lake.

There was no danger, and Phoebe's piercing screams soon brought relief, but Milly's mad fit was over. The icy plunge had restored her to her right mind, and it was a very penitent and self accusing girl who was quietly wrapped up and taken home by Jack Warren.

"I didn't realize what I was doing till I felt the cold water round me," said Milly tearfully, hiding her face against Jack's arm in the kindly twilight. "It was a sorry revenge that I had, Jack."

"It was a naughty and a dangerous thing to do, Milly," was her lover's reply, "but I think your cold bath brought us both to our senses."—Philadelphia Item.
