A SERGEANT'S SACRIFICE

[Original]
"Sergeant," said Major Swagney of the 4th United States Infantry, "the scout has just come in and reports that the Indians have broken loose, murdering and pillaging. My wife and children are at Stoughton's ranch. I want you to take four men and bring them in."

"I'll get them in, sir."

Sergeant Kimball saluted and left the room. The major controlled himself till the man was gone, then paced the floor in agony.

Kimball was one of those men occasionally to be found in the ranks of the army who are understood to be gentlemen, but about whom nothing is known prior to their enlistment. He had shown himself careless of danger; hence the major's selection of him for the task.

That afternoon the sergeant and his four men rode into Stoughton's ranch, and Kimball told Mrs. Swagney that her husband desired her to return to the fort, then his object in sending for her was concealed. A wagon and horses were taken from the barn and the family placed in it, and, attended by the escort, the journey was begun. One soldier rode ahead, one on each side the wagon and one directly behind. A mile in the rear rode Sergeant Kimball.

Half of the journey had been accomplished when the sergeant, standing at the summit of a pass between two hills and looking backward, saw Indians emerging from a wood and making for the road. There were more than a hundred of them, and he could see by their gaudy trappings that they were on the warpath. He watched them till they struck the road, and when they turned in his direction he knew that they would soon overtake the wagon. The color died out of his face, but a desperate resolve settled there instead. Casting about for loose timber, he made a pretense for a barricade across the road. Then, lying on his stomach, with his Winchester pointed across a log, he waited the coming of the Indians.

This man who was about to die that others might live was in a strange condition of mind. He remembered one who, born of the same mother, had fallen under temptation, one whose punishment he had taken upon himself. He recalled having been dropped by his friends, the contemptuous, averted look of the girl he loved. These were in his thoughts confused with sounds of the tramp of ponies, the guttural utterances of Indians coming up the road and the creak of the wagon lumbering toward the fort borne back on the wind.

"They'll hear the firing," he said to himself, "and move on at full speed. Better give the signal now and save time."

Selecting one of the Indians, he fired, emptying a saddle. The savages halted, ceased their jargon and looked up the road whence the shot had come. Kimball fired three more shots in rapid succession, dropping a man each time. Then the Indians took to cover. Again the wind brought back the sound of the creaking wagon, this time noisier and accompanied by the gallop of horses. Kimball knew that every moment he could delay the inevitable advance of the Indians over his body would add to the chances for the lives of the women and children.

The Indians below were quiet. The sergeant was familiar with their tactics and knew they were stealing upon him and around him. Presently there was a shot from his left. A bullet sang by his ears; then all was still again. But what a stillness! Insects were humming; birds were on the wing, occasionally pouring forth harmonious notes, then a far, faint creaking of the wagon, now doubtless nearing the fort. As sure as the sun shone mildly on that autumn afternoon, as sure as the leaves rustled in the breeze, death was creeping up on the man who was waiting for it.

Kimball knew the Indians were puzzled. They could not get into a position where they could see behind his little fortification, for he was screened by trees on both flanks. He saw an Indian creeping up on the limb of a tree close to his right. His rifle cracked, and the man pitched headlong to the ground.

Meanwhile there was another sound coming from the rear, the gallop of horses. Kimball knew that he had saved his charge and that in time would come, but he also knew that when it arrived all would be over with him. Since hills lay between the Indians and the coming horsemen the former did not hear for a time, and the soldiers were enabled to come within a short distance before they were discovered. Then the Redskins, knowing that relief was at hand, poured a fire from a hundred rifles into Kimball's little fortress and, mounting their horses, galloped away.

Major Swagney, followed by his men, coming like the wind, spurred his horse to the crest of the hill where the sergeant had made his defense. There lay Kimball, still alive, but bleeding from many wounds. The major dismounted and bent over him to thank him for the lives of his wife and children, but words would not come. The sergeant saw tears streaming from the commander's eyes and knew what he would say.

SCIENTIFIC OPTICS.

By Dr. C. W. Roberts.

The science of optics and refraction has developed and proven it a fact that a perfect eye never fails in its vision for distance. Even though a person may have perfect, distant vision, he may be compelling it through an imperfect eye. The eye, being controlled by the brain, means a constant strain if the eye is in the least imperfect.

The brain in turn calls on the nervous system to regain the strength necessarily used to compel vision; therefore, the brain or nerves are usually affected before the vision, when only grows bad because of loss of power to compel perfect vision through an imperfect eye. Now, as the perfect eye never fails for distant vision, it is the refractometer's business to make the imperfect eye perfect with glasses, and then it should never fail. Why? Because it has been made perfect. If your glasses are not so good that they correct every error—and there may be several errors—you will still have trouble, and be compelled to change your glasses time after time, and your eyes will be a constant source of annoyance and expense to you. This change and expense are also unnecessary.

Dr C W Roberts has fitted glasses for distant vision for the last fifteen years with the distinct understanding that if at any time in the future the vision could be in the least improved by himself or any other refractometer in the world, he would do it free of charge.

If you have headache or suffer from nervousness, it is almost absolute proof that your eyes are imperfect. When failure to obtain relief by the use of ordinary remedies demonstrates the fact that the trouble does not lie in ordinary causes, call on Dr C W Roberts at Hoffman House, Eugene, and he will make a free examination and give you such an explanation of your eyes and their connection with the nervous system that you cannot help but see why your eyes may be the cause of your trouble.

Cut This Out.
