To Watch Forests.

Forest Ranger A. L. Morris, of Harrisburg, writes the Albany Herald from Lowell, Maine, that he has been ordered to remain at that place during the winter to look after trespassers on the timber lands by settlers and surveyors. Every winter many persons cut logs from government land and this practice will be stopped if possible. Settlers who have no timber on their own lands can, by making application to the forest officer, be granted the privilege of using timber to the value of $100, provided they use it for wood, boards, shakes or building purposes on their own land.

WIDOW STEBBINS

By GEORGE M. BRISBANE

Copyright, 1901, by A. S. Richardson

Perkins of Ohio was an old man, a lame man and a decidedly homesy man, but he had a broad heart and a mind of money. He brought his mind of money to the Pennsylvania offshoots with the intention of increasing it to two mints. Incidentally he met Widow Stebbins.

Widow Stebbins lived in the center of the oil belt on a farm of twenty-one acres. Fifty years old, with a face that would stop a clock, she had been a widow for fifteen years. She had done her best to secure husband No. 2, but every man in the surrounding counties had fought shy of what they termed the homeliest and the talkative woman in Pennsylvania. But when oil was struck Widow Stebbins became the center of masculine interest. The valuation of her farm kited up into the thousands; and she determined to kill two birds with one stone. She would acquire riches and a husband at the same time.

She calmly announced that her farm, for which she had been offered $50,000, was never for sale nor to lease, but whoever married her could do what he liked with the property. Every man who heard of this imagined he had the chance of a lifetime, but the widow became more and more particular every day. She even refused men on account of the color of their hair or the size of their feet.

Perkins was among the first to offer his heart and hand to Widow Stebbins. Here was an opportunity that would not demand the investment of any of his treasured capital. The festive widow looked him over and pointed to the gate.

"You can pass right on. I don't believe I'd have married you ten years ago, when I used to feel like gold' out in the fields and sparkles a scare-crow."

Perkins swallowed his pride and offered her $100,000 cash for the farm, but again she laughed at him. Then, with righteous wrath blazing in his bosom, he rode back to town and called three of his young fellows into a conference. We were all the victim. A cold blooded agreement was drawn up in black and white. Perkins was to furnish all the capital for us to make a good appearance before the widow.

Many anecdotes show that Indians have not been wanting in calculation and cunning in their dealings with white people. Indeed, the patience, altho superior in intelligence and education, is often obliged to look very sharp in order not to become the dupes of the crafty red man. In "The Deserts of North America" this anecdote is related:

An Indian, after hearing a preacher speak from the text, "Make vows to heaven and keep them," went up to the preacher after the sermon and said:

"I have made a vow to go to your house."

The minister was a little surprised, but he smiled and said, "Well, keep your vow."

On arriving at the house the Indian seated himself and after a time remarked, "I have made a vow to run with you."

This was also granted, but when, after supper, the Indian announced, "I have made a vow to sleep in your house," the minister began to fear that there would be no end to the vows of his attentive auditor.

"That is easy to do, and you should keep your vow," he said. "I will give you a bed. But," he added, "I have made a vow that you shall leave to-morrow morning."

The Indian nodded. "Good," he said. "You make my vows come true, so I make your vow come true." And the next morning he went away in good humor.

Early Rising. The excellence of early rising and its inspiring influence on both body and mind have been themes for the poet's song and the sage's sermon. Early rising promotes cheerfulness of temper, opens up new channels of enjoyment and channels of delight to which the sluggish must be insensible.

It increases the sum of human existence by stealing from indolence hours that would else be utterly wasted, and, better still, unquestionably conduces to longevity. All long lives have been early risers.

Now, the habit of retiring to bed at late hours will hardly admit of early rising; therefore the necessity of refraining from the one in order to secure the advantage of the other. From six to eight hours are generally held to be sufficient and no doubt on the average are so.

Our sleep is regulated much by the season. In winter people lie longer on account, as they say, of its being too dark to get up early. There is some plausibility in the reason, but the system in cold and dark weather is more prone to sleep than in light and sunny times. Invalids need generally plenty of bed rest, and they should procure it by going early to bed.

There are more health and strength to be found in the practice of seeing the sun rise than in looking at it in any other part of the day.

Sly Cy. Squire Jones—I s'pose Cy must be awful smart arter two years in college, ain't he?

Uncle Henry—Smart! Waa! I reckon! W'y, that boy writes his expense items all in French, squire—Chicago News.

A Startling Surprise. Very few could believe in looking at A. T. Howley, a healthy, robust blacksmith of Tiber, Ind., that for ten years he suffered such tortures from rheumatism as few could endure and live. But a wonderful change followed his taking Electric Bitters. "Two bottles was all I needed," he writes, "and I have not felt a twinge since a year."

They regulate the bowels, purify the blood and cure inflammation, neuralgia, nervousness, indigestion, dyspepsia, give perfect health. Try them. Only 10c at W. L. DeLano's drug store.

perhaps you can cure my asthma and rheumatism. Yes, I think you'll do." "But I thought you wanted a poet," groaned the squire despairingly. "So I did, but I've changed my mind. A woman with my prospects in life ought the right to change her mind as often as she likes. You can bring the poet or ever as soon as you please."

The young doctor came back to us looking ten years older. It had been a fair and square agreement, but we could see that he wanted to throw us down. He was as poor as a church mouse, but the prospect of riches which we dangled before his eyes could not banish the memory of Widow Stebbins' face. Finally Perkins whispered to me:

"Lost his nerve. Have to be braced up. Champagne's the stuff."

But that was where we made our mistake. The doctor was one of those chaps who grow ugly under the influence of the sparkling fluid. Just when we had wedding bells and oil wells gushing simultaneously he broke loose, punched our heads all round, and the last news we got of him was that he had left Old City in a wagon, with a black eye and a broken nose.

For a week we mourned and could not be comforted—that is, the younger men mourned. Old Perkins, who had invested the capital in the matrimonial enterprise, swore not softly, but often.

At the end of that time we heard that Widow Stebbins had married a railroad conductor, who had won her out on the plea that she could travel on passes all over the world. That such a bait could win a woman who by the stroke of a pen could command millions is one of the inconsistencies of the sex generally and widows in particular.

Three days after their marriage the conductor had executed five leases, and the farm looked like a modern beehive. Then a strange thing happened and knocked out the husband, the geologists, the borers and all hands on the ground. Not a drop of oil was ever struck on that farm. They went down to sand rock and other kinds of rock, they bored and they torpedoes, but it was a dead loss. The oil basin seemed to have made an island of that farm.

A year later it was offered to any man who would take it and pay the tax. I never heard whether the doctor learned of his narrow escape or whether the unfortunate railroad man hung himself in despair, but personally I have always been profoundly grateful to Widow Stebbins for pronouncing me knee sprung, nearsighted and empty headed.

Took Him at His Word. Many anecdotes show that Indians have not been wanting in calculation and cunning in their dealings with white people. Indeed, the patience, altho superior in intelligence and education, is often obliged to look very sharp in order not to become the dupes of the crafty red man.
