Dredge or Jetty Work

The Astorian has this about comparative values of the jetty and dredge work as seen at the mouth of the Columbia:

"It costs the people at least $50,000 per month to keep the jetty work in motion. The big dredger Cinnoc can be utilized steadily for six months in the year for that sum and for less. And the difference lies not so much in the money expended as in the downright, palatable, sure and effective work accomplished by the latter, whereas the results of the jetty work are of the hypothetical sort and infinitely hard to measure. That's all."

There is no telling how otherwise she was dressed, but on the skeleton of a lady found in her apartment in ill fated Pompeii, covered by an eruption of Vesuvius in the year 79, has been found two golden bracelets, six of silver, four golden anklets, four ear rings, a golden collar, a golden belt and a golden band on her head, while by her lay a purse containing 107 silver coins.

At Philadelphia the managers of the Young Women's Christian Association have concluded that a "girl" of 35 is fully equipped to take care of herself outside and has outgrown any disposition to idleness, and in order to relieve the congestion at the Association Home and to make room for the large waiting list of country girls, has decided to thrust them out into the world. Some of the residents of the home have been there for twelve or fifteen years and though the new rule has been posted no one has yet confessed to being thirty-five.

Those Canadian French down in the lower part of Marion county have some remarkable specimens of longevity. Samuel A. Gault died the other day at Gervais at 90. His wife, 81, survives him. Then there is F. X. Mathieu, of Butteville, the last remaining pioneer of 1812, who is 88 years old. His wife—well, she was a native. White women were just a little scarcer than white men in this great Northwest those days. His descendants? Well, 6-year-old Violet Scheurer, his great-great-grandchild, died in Portland the other day. Figure out the generations from the old Frenchman to that grandchild.

W. B. DILLARD,
County Superintendent.
