Great River Transformation
 A few years since the great Colorado river at very high water cut through irrigating ditches near its mouth into a dry lake basin some fifty miles in diameter and lying at its deepest part some two hundred feet lower than the bed of the river. The entire flow of the Colorado region enforced by its tributary, the Gila, is now emptying into the great depression, its bed from there to its former mouth at the extreme northerly part of the Gulf of California being dry sand. A staff man of the San Francisco Chronicle who spent ten days there recently gives this account:
 "The flow of the Colorado and Gila rivers is pouring into the Salton Sea, the bed of which is 20 feet below sea level. Below the point where the Colorado leaves the old channel the bed of the stream, which formerly emptied into the Gulf of California, 80 miles away, is now as dry as dust. Salton basin is rapidly becoming a great inland sea, which threatens to modify the climate of all Southern California. Salton Sea is now from 10 to 15 miles wide and 45 miles long, and in the deepest part has a depth of 24 feet, which is increasing at the rate of over half an inch a day. The area of the basin, which is below sea level, is 2500 square miles.
 "If the flow of the Colorado is not controlled it will, in time, again fill the entire basin to sea level. At present the flow is about 3000 cubic feet a second, while the evaporation over the area now covered by water is four one-hundredths of an inch for every 24 hours.
 "Where formerly stood the town of Salton and the great salt works the water is now 20 feet deep. Most of the buildings have gone and others are rapidly going. It is well nigh impossible to turn the river back to its old channel, as the new channel is fully five feet below the level of the old bed.
