Wisconsin to Test Primary

With Oregon, Wisconsin this year will for the first time test the primary election law, although it has been in force in her big cities for several years. From a paper published there we take this regarding the nomination for governor in that safely Republican state:

Who will be nominated for governor on the Republican ticket? What will be the first fruit of the primary election law? Will it meet the expectations of its advocates and supporters? Will it give us a better governor than we ever had before? These are pertinent questions. They will be answered in September. If present indications are entitled to consideration in forecasting the outcome of this law, it is safe to say that the practical effect of its operation will be distressingly disappointing even to those whose devotion to its originator is superhuman in its simplicity.

It may be safely asserted of this law that it has given birth to gubernatorial aspirations in men whose qualifications for road supervisor might be seriously questioned. But the worst of all is that the aspirations of these men are recognized as perfectly proper and highly commendatory by a large per cent. of the voters, who have been led to believe that external evidence of devotion to questionable reforms is of more importance than ability to discharge the duties of the high office. No one who has observed the effect of this law can fail to appreciate its danger. When in the history of Wisconsin were there so many demagogues aspiring to office as there are today? Why is it? Simply because they know the voters don't know them and for this reason, under the primary election law, they will stand as good a show to be nominated as the worthy citizen. Under the convention system their fitness would be discussed, but under the primary election law discussion is impossible. Under the primary law we must accept whatever accidents turn up, no matter how bad they may be. It was so in Minneapolis when the first primary produced Ames, who was indicted on a felonious charge soon afterward. A similar dose awaits Wisconsin people. Nobody knows what kind of a man will be nominated for governor.

Not so many years ago the mere idea of a transcontinental railroad north of the Canadian Pacific would have been held the emanation of a disordered brain. Yet they are now building a line from St. Johns, New Brunswick, on the Atlantic coast, to Port Simpson, five hundred miles north of Vancouver, on the Pacific. The road to Edmonton, in the Alberta country, must be completed by the fall of 1907. To accomplish this they are building seventy-five miles a month. The population of Edmonton, the centre of a vast agricultural district, has increased from 4,000 to 11,000 in the past three years.
