CONTEST FOR NOMINATIONS IN COUNTY

I. H. Bingham Nominated By Small Plurality Over J. M. Shelley

For Representatives Eaton, Washburn and Edwards Receive the Nomination--Lee for County Clerk

The election by the new direct primary law was held yesterday. Generally a light vote was cast, as farmers took advantage of the fine day to work, while the news from the stricken earthquake city was of more interest in the cities than the election.

For county offices the only fight of interest was for the nomination for senator and representative on the Republican ticket. The balance of the nominations on both the Democratic and Republican tickets were foregone conclusions.

Reports from all but a few small precincts indicate that I. H. Bingham has been nominated for state senator by a small plurality, with Shelley a close second and Griffin third, while B. A. Washburne, Allen H. Eaton and I. N. Edwards are undoubtedly chosen as candidates for representatives.

For county clerk E. U. Lee has a big majority over J. J. Winn, and H. D Edwards, for county commissioner, received only 19 votes in the two Cottage Grove precincts, while Kayser had in the same precincs 212 votes, but Edwards wins the nomination in the county easily. For the rest of the ticket there was no contest. Many small precincts are still missing but will not change the result.

For Eugene precinct nominations the Republicans nominated R. S. Bryson for justice and F. T. Plank for constable. The Democrats nominated Geo. W. Kinsey for justice and H. P. Morris for constable.

CLOSE CONTEST FOR STATE NOMINEES

some surprises. Lachner received a much heavier vote in this county than expected. In a number of precincts he leads Ellis. Shepherd has probably a plurality in the county, but returns from outside counties are as yet very meagre. They are expected to put Ellis to the fore.

The result of the legislative contests are still in doubt, though A. A. Bailey appears to lead for joint senator. S. C. Beach is probably the nominee for senator, and James U. Campbell is in the lead for joint senator. At Bourne's headquarters the belief is expressed that he will be the Republican nominee in spite of Cake's heavy lead in this county. Scattering reports from various precincts of the state show a good vote for Bourne. Cake's plurality in this city will be large.

Withycombe carries Yamhill, as does Cake. Bourne carries Union, as does Geer. Cake carries Washington, as does Withycombe. Bourne carries Wasco, as does Smith. Withycombe carries Linn, as does Cake. Bourne and Withycombe carry Benton. Geer and Bourne carry Josephine. Lowell carries Morrow, as does Geer. Bourne and Geer carry Clatsop and Jackson. Withycombe carries Marion. Lowell carries Umatilla as does Withycombe. Cake carries Baker, as does Brown.

Portland, Incomplete returns indicate a close race between Bourne and Cake for nomination for senator, with chances favoring the former on account of the big vote in Multnomah. Lowell is third.

It is nip and tuck between Geer and Withycombe for governor, with Johns third in the race.

Hawley will probably be nominated for congressman in the First district and Ellis in the second.

Sixty-six out of ninety precincts in Multnomah county for Cake or give Bourne, 1509; Cake, 2679; Lowell, 863; Smith, 541; Watson, 757.

For governor—Brown, 762; Geer, 2624; Johns, 1272; Schlueter, 2; Withycombe, 1581.

Word was nominated for sheriff by the Democrats by three to one and Stevens by the Republicans.

ODD MIXUP IN DRESS TROUSERS

How Senator Aldrich Missed a Dinner and Governor Magoon of Panama Had a Fine Time—Speaker Cannon's Vegetarian Experience—Jokes Cracked Between Senators—Postmaster General's Night Off.

Governor Charles E. Magoon of Panama and Senator Aldrich of Rhode Island occupy adjoining apartments at the Arlington hotel, says the New York World's Washington correspondent. They employ the same valet.

The other night Governor Magoon took some ladies to the theater. As one of the ladies stepped from the carriage she dropped her fan. Governor Magoon stooped to pick it up. There was a horrible tearing sound. The governor knew what had happened. He excused himself to the ladies, saying it was imperative that he should return to his hotel for a few moments. He gave the ladies the ticket and promised to return in a short time. Then he hurried to the hotel. He went to his room and found Senator Aldrich sitting there, mutely gazing at a pair of trousers that lapped around him.

"By George, Magoon," said the senator, "I am glad to see you! Do you know, that stupid valet has mixed up our dress trousers? You have on mine, and I cannot wear yours. They are too large for me. I trust you have come back to change, for I am late for my dinner engagement as it stands."

"Indeed I have come back to change," said Magoon. "Gimme those trousers. They are mine. As for these I have on, you are quite welcome to them."

Senator Aldrich shucked off Magoon's trousers, but when he came to put on his own, which Magoon had been wearing, there was a succession of loud cries. He stayed in the hotel that night, but Magoon hustled back to the theater in his own trousers and said he had a fine time.

Speaker Cannon accepted an invitation the other day to attend a dinner given by a vegetarian, says the St. Louis Post-Dispatch's Washington correspondent. The speaker had been busy at the capitol trying to keep the stalwarts in line on the statehood bill, and he was ready to eat a square meal when evening came. He went to the house of his host, ate of the dinner and returned to his hotel. The next morning a member asked him how he had enjoyed the meal.

"I shall never do such a foolish thing again," responded Uncle Joe. "We had bean soup, beans, spinach, carrots and what not, but not a single dish that appealed to me. And we wound up by having hay for dessert. This idea of living on vegetables does not appeal to me. I was compelled to go to a restaurant after the meal and get something to eat. Me for beefsteak and gravy hereafter."

Two Ohio women recently sat in the house gallery studying the scene below, says the Washington representative of the New York Times.

"See that fine looking old man with the snow white hair and beard? I wonder who he is," said one of them who seemed to be a stranger.

"Do you mean that big old man with the young man talking to him? The young man is very bald."

"Well, a man's lucky to be bald. His wife can never pull his hair out."

The old man was ex-Speaker Keifer; the young man was Nicholas Longworth.

Senators are not above cracking jokes at the expense of each other when chance offers, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger's Washington correspondent. Ex-Governor Murphy of New Jersey was a visitor at the capitol recently and, with Representative Wood of the Trenton district on one side and Senator Dryden on the other, enjoyed a half hour's study of the most dignified legislative body in the world.

Soon Senator Kean was seen to enter the gallery and make his way down to the governor's seat to shake hands with him.

"Dryden," observed a senator who was looking at the party, "has got Murphy to take a policy in the Prudential by this time."

"And now," said another, "John Kean is going to sell him his copy of 'Fads and Fancies.'"

One of the chief electricians at the big building occupied by the postoffice department while working up Pennsylvania avenue the other night observed that there were no lights on the floor occupied by the postmaster general and his assistant, says the Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Public Ledger. He rushed up and, dashing into the dynamo room, asked if there had been an accident.

"Why, no; there's no one on the postmaster general's floor," explained the dynamo tender.

"Anything happened to the gentlemen?"

"No; they're taking dinner at the White House tonight."

"Good heavens! Pardon me. That's the first time that floor has been in darkness since March 4, 1885, and I thought you were having trouble."

It was the postmaster general's fourth night off since taking office, and his first assistant's, General Hitchcock's, four in all in three years.

A Story of Woman's Enmity

[Original.]

What a delightful period that when boys and girls are coming of age! But of course to enjoy youth we should have the facilities for doing so. I was at that age a member of a large family, and my father's home was in the country. In summer and during the winter holidays we children, growing up into manhood and womanhood, always had a house full of our young friends.

When I came home from college in my senior year for the winter holidays my sister told me that she had invited her special friend, Mary Lockwood, for my particular benefit. Sisters at that age wish to be, but are not, matchmakers. Nothing could be devised so well calculated to drive two young people of opposite sex apart as to tell them that they are intended for each other. Mary Lockwood and I quarreled from the first. She soon began to say sharp things to me, and I retorted by indifferently drawling out compliments that were palpably ironical. In our games I would choose her on my side, then sneer at her play. She was very bright and poured out a number of witty sayings that tended to make me a laughing stock. But the most vengeful thing she did during her stay was to step deliberately under the mistletoe when I was nearest to her, thus daring me to kiss her. Egged on by the others, who were all well aware of our feud, I stepped up to her, took her in my arms, and in the scuffle that ensued she bit my cheek.

I got my revenge in this wise: When the furniture was cleared for dance I stepped up to her and asked her to dance with me. I believed she would refuse, and she did, before the assembled company. Here was something that I could notice. From that time forward I paid no attention to her whatever. This cast a damper on our festivities, and my sister begged me to apologize to Mary, but when I asked for what I should ask pardon she had no reply. Matters went on from bad to worse till we dispersed. When Mary Lockwood departed she left me a note apologizing for having refused to dance with me in my own home. If she had given me this before she went we might have parted friends.

After graduation I studied my profession—medicine—in the city in the neighborhood of which we lived and from which our friends had come to visit us. A very select set of young people got together for semiweekly dances, and Mary Lockwood was among them. I was delighted when a friend of mine asked me to join the "Rug Beaters," as they called themselves, and consented. I heard nothing more of the matter all spring, then learned that Mary Lockwood had "blackballed" me.

I began to feel what it is to have the enmity of a woman. Till I learned of this serious overt act I did not consider our quarrel of importance, but now I did not dare to make any move where she could stab me. My most intimate friends were members of the "Rug Beaters," and I would not join any other club, so my winter's amusement was spoiled.

One day while I was listening to a lecture at the medical school on nerve structures the professor said: "Women are especially subject to nerve tension. Men fight each other for many different causes; women quarrel from nervous strain and are more apt to have paroxysms of anger with those they like than those to whom they are indifferent." I was surprised that a physician should not know what I knew by actual experience.

One evening at a party I saw my enemy among the throng. I had never seen her before in a ball dress and was surprised at her queenly appearance. I noticed, however, that there was a sad look in her eyes. It quite disarmed my just indignation at her having injured me. I could not conceive of a man thus doing so, and the woman's act seemed to me a base one. The baser that she had been my sister's guest. Nevertheless I pitied her. While I was studying her face she turned toward me. She looked away at once and with an expression much the same as I had been used to when we were together. I determined to tell her what I thought of her keeping me out of the "Rug Beaters" and, going up to her, bade her good evening. I was received about as I had expected and, giving her my arm, took her out of the throng. Seated in a cozy nook unobserved, I spoke to her of my sister's introducing us and her good intentions in doing so. Then I pictured how the matter might have turned out had we not begun a useless and harmful quarrel. I spoke regretfully of my own shortcomings and was about to enter upon informing her that I knew she had turned an enemy in my path to injure me when—her head was turned from me so I could not see her face—I felt her hand laid on mine. Bending forward, I saw tears in her eyes.

I could not now repeat the steps by which we were in a few moments—if we were not instantly—converted from enemies to lovers. But in this I must speak for myself, for she confessed that she had loved me from even before she had seen me, when my sister had sent her my picture—a picture that she had treasured ever since. Finding that acts which I had supposed sprang from hate really had sprung from love caused me a conscious revulsion. It was as if a heavy laden, dank wind had suddenly changed to one full of invigorating ozone.

I am at present lecturing at the medical college at which I studied. I have embodied in one of my lectures the words I pronounced false. I did not know how true I should find them.
