Timid Nancy

When I was appointed paymaster at the mills I was given a little shanty in the yard for an office. I wanted a safe, but they wouldn't give me one. The money was handed me in envelopes to pay out at once. I made a closet in the shanty with a lock and bolts so that if I must leave the money there for a short time I could lock it up. In lieu of a clerk I had a slip of a girl, Nancy O'Neil when she came to me was only fifteen, but she was bright, and I soon worked her in to relieving me in my accounts. She was a delicate, pale faced little thing, and I never felt it safe to leave her alone in the office with any cash there.

One day I went in to find Nancy on a chair looking frightened half out of her senses. It was the old story of woman's timidity, and there was a mouse in the room.

"Nancy," I said, "this won't do. I am obliged, as you know, to keep small sums of money in my desk, and we've got men at work we don't know much about. Suppose some rascal should come in here and help himself? I'm afraid I'll have to demand a man assistant."

I was fully minded to do what I said, but Nancy begged so hard that I promised to do nothing in the matter for awhile longer, though I was determined to bring the matter up at the beginning of the year, when all such changes were usually made.

One Saturday soon after this I received the pay envelopes for the week and took them to the office. I was about starting out with them when I received an order to go at once to the president's office. Meanwhile one of the principal directors had come in to talk over some important matter with him, and when I arrived I was told to wait. I had left the pay envelopes in a big drawer in my desk. I would have put them in the closet, but I had been checking them off with Nancy, and they were scattered over the desk, and not daring to keep the president waiting, I opened the drawer, scraped them into it, locked it and told Nancy I would be back in a few minutes. While I was waiting I thought about the money in the desk, but nothing had ever happened, and I didn't worry much.

At last the president summoned me into his private office and told me that they had taken up the matter of expenses for the coming year, and, as the profits were dissatisfying to the stockholders, he had decided to retrench. A number of the less important employees were to be dropped, and I must get along without Nancy. This let me out of the responsibility of sending her away, so I said nothing and hurried back to my office, my mind occupied with how I should break the news to her.

When I entered Nancy was looking out of the window watching for me. I determined to get the unpleasant duty off my mind at once and commenced to tell her that her services would be no longer needed. She tried to stop me, but I raised my voice above hers and finished what I had to say. To my surprise she didn't seem to pay any attention to the matter, waiting till I had told my story; then, coming near, she whispered:

"There's a man in the closet."

"A man?"

"Yes. He must have seen the cashier's clerk come in with the envelopes, for no sooner had you gone than he came in and told me that if I didn't give them to him he'd kill me. I had to make up my mind pretty quick what I would do, for, you see, I'm only a girl, and he looked so fierce and held a knife at my throat."

"Well?" I interrupted impatiently.

"I knew that if I didn't do something right off—"

"Cut it short!" I cried fiercely. "Is the money gone?"

"I told him that if he'd look in the closet—I didn't want to tell a real lie, and I didn't need to, for I'd only got that far when he ran into the closet, and I shut the door on him and locked and bolted it."

The first thing I did was to take a glance at the envelopes; the second was to pick Nancy up and give her such a hug that she cried out; then I dropped her and gave an alarm. Several persons came running in, and I told one of them to go and tell the president that the men's week's pay was in jeopardy and to come at once. In two minutes he was there. Then, with a revolver in one hand, I opened the closet door with the other, and a man came slinking out. He was one we had taken on a few weeks before and had come on purpose to rob.

"That little girl," I said, pointing, "has saved the company $16,000."

"How did you do it?" asked the president.

Nancy told her story, evidently quite surprised that she had done anything remarkable. When she had finished the president turned away, saying:

"Keep her for the police. Come and see me tomorrow morning, Nancy."

When Nancy called the president offered her a good salary, but I had forestalled him by giving her another if not a better job. She was to run my home as my wife. However, not to be outdone, he turned to his desk and wrote her a check for $1,000 for a wedding present.

I now have a fighting man with me in the office.

The Sunbonnet Boss.

Mrs. W. E. Morgan of Missouri is boss of one of the richest zinc mines in that state. To her employees she is known as the "Sunbonnet Boss," and they are said to like her and work well under her directions. Garbed in rubber skirt, coat, hat and boots, she goes down into a mine when necessary, and she is on the ground to superintend operations. It is said to be due to her business foresight that the mine is being worked anyway, for the property had been condemned as worthless and was lying fallow, a combination of dump pile and water, when Mrs. Morgan saw its possibilities. She organized a company, purchased the engine, pump and other necessary machinery, employed the men, drained the mine and sunk the shaft deeper, and now is rewarded by a rich yield of zinc ore.

Sewing on Buttons.

When replacing the lost buttons of garments it is very important that the new buttons should be of the same size as the old ones. Careless menders pay no attention to this trifling detail, and the consequence is that buttons that are too small will not remain fastened, and those which are too large tear the buttonholes. A button box for storing reserve buttons should find a place in every mending basket. In this receptacle should be put all buttons which have been ripped off old garments as well as any complete set of buttons there may be. Housekeepers who pick up and put away in its allotted place every button which falls into their hands may save themselves many purchases.

The Waxed Floor.

Here is an excellent method of removing grease spots from a waxed floor: Pour spirits of turpentine on the spot and give it time to soak into the wood. Then cover with powdered talc and press with a warm but not very hot iron. The talc will absorb the grease. Brush off and polish the place anew with wax.

Massaging the Face.

The skin should be perfectly clean before the massaging of the face is begun. Use the complexion brush, with warm water and pure soap. When rubbing in a cream always have the motions upward and outward. Send the flattened palms from chin up to the ears. Move the finger tips about in little circles, pressing inward gently and being careful not to push the flesh up into tiny lines. Do this always at night, and every morning bathe the face with cold water, drying with gentle pats with an old soft towel.

A Curved Ball.

Many boys do not understand why a ball may be made to curve in its flight. Here is the explanation: When a ball is thrown it is retarded in its forward motion by the resistance of the air, which exerts a pressure not only on the face of the ball, but a resisting force on its sides by friction. If the ball be simply thrown forward the friction of the air will be equal on each side of it, but if one side be made to move faster than the other—that is, if the ball be made to rotate on its own axis so as to increase the lateral friction—the natural result is a curve in the direction of the side on which its motion has been retarded. That is the philosophy of a "curved ball."
