Effects of Irrigation

The possibilities of irrigation are almost incalculable, as the following from the Pendleton East Oregonian shows:

"Yesterday the East Oregonian published an item about the sale of a tract of apple orchard land in Yakima county for $2000 per acre.

"This seems unbelievable. People not familiar with the miracles of irrigation will doubt the statement.

"But the sale is a matter of record. And the best and most miraculous part of the story is that this same land which last week sold for this fabulous sum was but a short time ago worthless sage brush land, not a whit better than thousands of acres now lying uncultivated in many parts of Oregon.

"But the magic touch of water transformed it. The completion of the irrigating ditch gave it new and wondrous life. It was regenerated, resuscitated, given the breath and vitality of life by the application of the idle waters which have flowed by it for centuries.

"The apple crop on this land was this year sold for $700 per acre, the buyer picking, pecking and shipping the fruit without cost to the grower.

"The variety of apples planted on this tract was the Spitzenberg, which is said to thrive better in this climate than in any other. The sale of the apple crop mentioned included only the first and second grade fruit, the third grade, which comprises a small proportion of the crop, being left over as an additional income to the grower."
