Results of Elections

The result of the election of yesterday shows no surprising changes. New York is still a doubtful state and the Tammany organization remains intact in the great city, despite the fact that Mayor McClellan stripped his old friends of official patronage and attempted to disrupt it, being aided by Richard Croker, State Senators McCarren, of Brooklyn, and others. Still, however, Tammany rolls up about 80,000 majority for Hearst and elects practically its entire judicial, legislative and congressional ticket.

Hearst is defeated, but his remarkable showing makes him a power to be reckoned with in the future, and his marvellous speech-making tour proved him possessed of extraordinary powers as a leader of men.

Throughout the country there seems little real change in political sentiment, and the status of the two parties in congress will not be materially changed.

Circuit court is in session at Eugene City as at Eugene, but down there, they should change its name to divorce court, as out of the one hundred cases on the docket seventy are for divorce. Twenty-one divorce decrees were returned in a single day recently by the presiding judge, McBride. Without taking the moral feature of such wholesale divorce into question, it is pitiful to think of the children, the real sufferers from divorce.

Portland Elks don't want negro Elks. Another illustration of the fact that however much some Northern people pity the poor negro and ask that he be treated as an equal in the South, they have no use for him North. As the Western man knows how to handle the Indian and make him keep his place, so the South can be trusted to treat the negro to the best advantage of both. The negro is entitled to equality before the law—social equality he will never enjoy.

The Portland Journal says one million bushels of wheat, valued at two million dollars, tied up by the car shortage. It seriously affects hops, lumber, flour, fruit and livestock interests too, all over Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

Tim Woodruff, chairman of the Republican committee in New York, says that "80 per cent of the campaign funds in former years came from the corporations." At last Judge Parker may consider himself vindicated.

The Oregonian very pertinently remarks that "the British bark Peter Iredale is said to have been wrecked because it could find no pilots outside the mouth of the Columbia river," then with fine sarcasm adds: "Well, the pilots are safe."

Roseburg, at town of 3000 people, is becoming extremely virtuous. The common council has decided that fifteen saloons are enough for the place, and will license no more.

A Chicago judge has sentenced a man to jail for allowing his wife to support him. What is the country going to do for jails if this thing spreads?

In rural England a girl is not allowed to see her engagement ring until after the wedding ceremony. You would never see an American girl take such long chances as that.

Hughes voted in a barber shop and had a close shave; Hearst cast his ballot in an undertaker's parlors and got buried. That's the way our devil figures it out.

Current Topics of Interest

Lena S. Walton, the "Queen of Alaska," is visiting Portland. She is one of the richest mine owners in the Far North, and intends to erect a building at the Seattle fair, and expects soon to publish a new magazine, which she will call the "Alaska Northwesterner," with headquarters at Portland.

Rose L. Fritz, of New York, who won the world's typewriting championship in Chicago last June, came out ahead in the contest at the National Business Men's show at Madison Square Garden last week. She wrote 2467 words from dictation in half an hour, making five errors. Of the other 13 entrants, Paul Munter, who defeated Miss Fritz last fall, came nearest to her record. He wrote 2466 words, but made 61 errors.

It's an off week in Eugene when a new divorce suit is not begun, says the Albany Democrat.

Enough girls will be sent to Jamestown by the newspapers of the country, rather by the people, to make the exposition a success.—Albany Democrat.

HIS LORDSHIP

[Copyright, 1906, by Homer Sprague.]
 Henri Fletcher's ambition was to be an English swell. As he was sauntering across St. James' park one day, head up, glass in his eye and his cane held at the proper angle, some one ran against him and cried out:

"Dear, dear me, but what a fortunate meeting! Why, my dear fellow, I was just on my way to your club to hunt you up."

The speaker was a young man like Mr. Fletcher. He was got up after the same pattern.

"Now, my lord, old boy, those curios have arrived from Egypt, and my man is unpacking them. I want you to see the collection and give me your opinion. Rather have it than any other man's in England, ye know."

Mr. Fletcher saw that the stranger had made a mistake, but he blushed with pleasure. He had not only been mistaken for an Englishman, but for a lord. Instead of explaining the situation he let the other go on with:

"And you'll give me an hour of your time and an opinion on my collection? If you don't fancy it, I'll sell the whole business at auction. Only a step, ye know, but here's a cab."

"I think I should explain to you," began Mr. Fletcher as the other seized his arm. But before he could go further he was at the door of the cab.

The ride lasted only ten minutes, and during that time the stranger did all the talking and flew from one subject to another so rapidly that Mr. Fletcher had no show to explain things. The cab rattled up to a fine mansion, which might have been the town house of a duke, and arm in arm the two ascended the steps. An obsequious servant admitted them, they passed upstairs, and two minutes later Mr. Fletcher found himself menaced by a pistol in the hands of the second man, while the first was saying:

"Be gentle with him, Billy. He's far from his home and mamma, you know."

He was ordered to sit down, and he sat. His ankles were tied to the chair, so that he couldn't get up again in a hurry. A gag was laid on the table at his elbow. A bottle of wine and a glass were also placed there. Then the man with the pistol, who seemed sorry that there was no occasion to shoot anybody, withdrew, and the other sat down and observed:

"My lord, you may call me Jones."

"I'm hanged if I do!" shouted Mr. Fletcher, who was beginning to wake up at last.

"Then call me Brown. It's all the same, you know. Now, my lord—"

"I am not a lord!"

"There now, Mr. Fletcher, I want to have a few minutes' conversation with you. Owing to certain stock investments that were ill advised I am at this moment in want of what we Americans call the needful. I shall be compelled to ask you for the loan of at least $5,000. If you cut up nasty the figures will be doubled."

"Then you brought me here in broad daylight to rob me?"

"As you see. No game could be safer. Partly furnished house to rent, and after paying my plans I took it and paid one-quarter in advance. I said laying my plans. It did not require any great astuteness. I knew your weak point, you see—have heard it discussed in New York many a time."

"What do you mean by my weak point?" asked Mr. Fletcher.

"Wanting to be taken for an it. When I called you my lord back there in the park you just glowed from head to foot. I've been following you around for a week, and the plans are all laid out."

"I don't know what you mean," said Mr. Fletcher.

"I don't know what you mean," said Mr. Fletcher.

"I don't know what you mean," said Mr. Fletcher.

"Nothing New In Government Ownership Of Railroads"

By United States Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE of Massachusetts

WE led the way in Massachusetts in establishing state supervision of the railroads, and we did it so wisely and so well that Mr. Asquith, the great English authority on railroads, in his testimony before the senate committee on interstate commerce and in his book on railroads refers to the Massachusetts legislation as A MODEL FOR THE SUPERVISION OF RAILROADS.

But the supervision and the regulation of the railroads are one thing and their OWNERSHIP is another and totally different thing. I believe in the exercise of the national power to REGULATE interstate commerce. I give to the interstate commerce clause of the constitution the LARGEST POSSIBLE INTERPRETATION, but it does not follow from that that I should support the ownership of the railroads by the government.

I offered an amendment to the rate bill, and it now forms the first sentence of the law which includes within the jurisdiction of the interstate commerce commission the PIPE LINES of the country. I thought they needed regulation and supervision as much as anything in this country and that they ought to have been included, but it does not follow from that that I think the United States should take over and OWN THE BUSINESS of the Standard Oil company. I think we should regulate and control, that we should prevent so far as possible the UNDUE DISCRIMINATIONS which that great monopoly secures from the railroads. I think that we should make them do business with justice to the people whom they serve, but I do not think it would be wise for the United States to go into the business of refining oil, and I think the gulf that separates those two propositions is as wide as it can possibly be.

If you place in the hands of the government the BUSINESS AGENCIES of the country, you confer upon it powers which alter its entire character. It is not a question of whether the United States should have those powers as against the states. It has nothing to do with NATIONALISM OR SEPARATISM. It has to do with the very essence of all government. Is it well for any government to take possession of the business agencies of the country and run them?

We know in what direction those policies point; they point toward SOCIALISM. There is nothing new in it. It is an old remedy that has been suggested in the past centuries over and over again in order to cure the ills that flesh is heir to. You will find the doctrines of communism, of socialism, discussed MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND YEARS AGO and satirized in the comedies of Aristophanes. You will find them solemnly discussed in the republic of Plato and by Aristotle in his politics.

We cannot afford to close our eyes and sit down and say everything is right and we will DO NOTHING. That is the attitude of the tory and the reactionary.

WHAT WE CAN DO IS WHAT WE HAVE DONE—MEET THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR, BUT MEET IT WITH MEASURES WHICH PROCEED ALONG THE LINES MARKED OUT BY THE GREAT MEN WHO HAVE FOUNDED THE REPUBLIC AND CONTINUED BY THE GREAT MEN WHO SAVED THE REPUBLIC.
