I have fired the walking stick I've carried over forty years, on account of a sore that resisted every kind of treatment until I tried Bucklen's Arnica Salve. SENATOR MULKEY WILL ADDRESS ASSEMBLY

Oregon's Young Ex-United States Senator Will Speak to Students—Baseball Team Will Play at Corvallis Saturday.

Ex-United States Senator F. W. Mulkey, from Oregon, a graduate of '94, will speak Wednesday morning to the university students in Villard hall. Cordial invitations have been extended to the Commercial Club of the city and other similar organizations. He will be the last speaker here this year before commencement, and his address will undoubtedly be worthy of the time. His subject has not been chosen yet.

Ball Team Plays O. A. C.
The University of Oregon baseball team plays the O. A. C. next Saturday at Corvallis. The "varsity" won from the farmers 9 to 3, and believe they can do so again on the home field of their opponents. The game with Corvallis will be the last of the season.

The team has had a very successful season, the only games they lost being on the trip in Eastern Washington, when five were dropped. Altogether seven games have been won and five lost. Undoubtedly most of the games lost so early could be won at the present time, for the nine has improved 100 per cent, especially in batting.

DEVIL AT MASK BALL

Lunatic Disguised as Mephistopheles the "Hit" of Thomas F. Walsh's Party.

ACTED HIS PART TO THE LIFE

Played the Devil With Young Husband's Feelings by Flirting With Bride and Was Thrown Out in Consequence.

Mephistopheles came also to Thomas F. Walsh's mask ball in Washington on New Year's eve, and, as usual, invited except by himself. And, also as usual, he kicked up a row. Mr. and Mrs. Walsh had planned a very jolly but quiet little affair, sending out only 210 cards and taking special care in the list. There have been affairs before in which they figured as hosts which subsequently acquired more or less notoriety extremely unpleasant to them. This time they made preparations to escape any such misfortune, but they reckoned without Mephistopheles.

With each invitation there was included a card of admission to the big Massachusetts avenue home, without which none of the invited could gain entrance. It was the natural supposition of the hosts that these cards would be properly protected, and the only slip made by the hosts was in not examining them carefully as they were presented. After the somewhat spectacular exit of Mephistopheles there was a scrutiny of cards deposited at the different dressing room doors, and several were found to bear the names of persons known not to be in Washington that night. But then it was too late.

Mr. and Mrs. Walsh welcomed their guests in the drawing room. Mephistopheles came early. He was properly built for his role and he was gorgeously attired as ever Edward de Reuzke was on the metropolitan stage. He himself admitted, however, that he had been somewhat hurried in making up. He had dined rather more sparingly than his fellow guests, and as he greeted his hosts he made that fact known.

"Could I by chance," he said pleasantly, "have such a thing as a glass of milk?"

That was not on the regular list of beverages at the Walsh mansion on New Year's eve, but Mephistopheles was soon supplied. It was good milk, and the black whiskered red devil drank it with evident enjoyment. There was profuse expression of grateful thanks, and then, emboldened by his success in his first request, he proffered a new one.

"Could I borrow a razor?" he asked. That rather startled Mr. Walsh, but it did not arouse any suspicion as to the character of his guest. He rather put it down to the natural playfulness of the occasion.

"I didn't have time to shave," continued the guest. Then, to help along, he turned to Mrs. Walsh and said: "I hope you like the costume. I should have liked it to be a little more accurate, but it was obtained in great haste, as I have just got out."

Not until considerably later in the evening did that remark strike the character of the guest. Mr. Walsh saw that a razor—fortunately, perhaps, it was a safety—was supplied, and Mephistopheles soon reappeared from the dressing room with the evidences of extra growth removed from behind his carefully trained black Imperial.

Then the fun began in earnest. Mephistopheles was among the happiest of the guests. He danced extremely well, he talked in an uncommonly interesting manner, and he had a proper eye for beauty. There was an element of the unusual in his conversation that gave it piquancy and charm. He was one of the most interesting men there.

Right at the beginning he selected a charming young Egyptian dancer as his special attraction. He devoted himself to her with more than Mephistopheles' courtesy and insistence. She was rather petite and he tall and straight. They made a fine looking couple, and her costume, chiefly gold embroidered scarfs, anklets, bangles and a gold bandeau, contrasted well with the scarlet of Mephistopheles.

It was a case, so evidently a case that it got on the nerves of the comparatively new husband of the Egyptian dancer, and as the evening wore on there was no improvement. Champagne was served both before and after supper, and the devotion and demonstration of Mephistopheles to the dancer became steadily warmer.

At last the disagreement reached a climax. The young husband appealed to Mr. Walsh, and he spoke to Mephistopheles. It was a gentle request at first, mild as the milk the red devil had imbibed on his arrival. But Mephistopheles, having had something stronger than milk since then, concluded there was a jest in the request of his host and failed to see the urgency of the language in which it was couched. Thereupon four stalwart retainers of the house entered into muscular negotiations with Mephistopheles and carried him bodily down to the dressing room. There protest ceased on the part of the masker, and in the presence of the angry husband and the affronted host he was unmasked.

Not a soul in the room had ever seen him before.

Mephistopheles had been lodged to the dressing room limp and crumpled. Now he sat up, sober and unabashed.

"Pleasant evening," he said. "Fine party."

Husband and host together demanded explanation. Their words mingled in an inseparable jumble, but there was no mistaking their demeanor. Mephistopheles gazed thoughtfully into space for a moment. Then he looked at Mr. Walsh and then at the angry husband.

"Good night, gentlemen," he said sweetly, and the next minute there was no trace of him, even in the street. With true Mephistophelian agility he had disappeared entirely from view.

The dance went merrily on until morning, the list of the carriages, with their gorgeously clad occupants, passing through Dupont circle in the fall light of the New Year sun. The disappearance of the conspicuous Mephistopheles aroused curiosity, and Mr. Walsh had many questions to answer. But there was no answer to give. But since New Year's day he has learned that on Christmas day a man formerly well known in Washington society had escaped from his attendants in the insane asylum where he has been confined for some time and a day or two later came to Washington. That was surely a Mephistophelian trick.

Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, who contemplates a domino party, says her husband will meet each arriving guest downstairs and that to one used be afraid of any intruders at 1801 Massachusetts avenue.

Baby's Body in Christmas Package.

After arriving home from Stoughton, Wis., where he had been doing some Christmas shopping, Chairman W. K. Reindahl of Dunkirk carefully slipped into a side door with his arms filled with bundles, went to a locked room where he had set up a Christmas tree, and started unwrapping packages to hang their contents on the tree. The first one he opened look strange, but he went at it, confidently expecting to find a doll for his niece. Instead, to his horror, he discovered the naked body of a dead child. While he was in Stoughton some one had put the ghastly bundle in the rear of his carriage, and he had not noticed it.

Parboiled in Dyeing Vat.

While working in a huge vat at the Menantico bleach and dye works at Millville, N. J., Leon Croslin was horribly and probably fatally scalded. Croslin had crawled through the manhole into the vat to arrange some goods preparatory to steaming them, when a valve in one of the large pipes burst, and a stream of boiling water and steam fell upon him. The young man gave one scream and then lost consciousness. Before his fellow workmen could stop the flow of scalding water he was literally parboiled.

Found Live Tond in Lump of Coal.

John Savage of Buck Hill, Md., a miner in the Enterprise mine, was greatly astonished when in breaking a solid lump of coal he saw a live toad jump out and hop around his feet. The hole in which the toad was confined was not large enough to permit any exercise on his part. It is supposed the batrachian centuries ago dug himself a hole in the ground and went to sleep.
