

It's time you learned about

Suesine Silk

Suesine Silk is not a mercerized cotton or imitation of silk—it is silk—real silk, fortified inside the fabric with a fine, thin fibre of Egyptian cotton, giving double strength and double wear without detracting from the exquisite beauty and fineness of the silk itself.

Suesine Silk comes in all the leading shades, is 27 inches wide and retails at

50c per yard

BROWNSVILLE JEWELRY STORE ROBBED OF $2,000

Chief of Police Farrington this morning about 9 o'clock received a telephone message from the city marshal at Brownsville stating that C. O. Anderson's jewelry store there had been broken into last night and $2,000 worth of stock stolen. Later the chief received a telegram from the proprietor of the store conveying the same information and requesting him to look out for any suspicious characters.

Chief Farrington has been on the lookout all day but has seen no one that looked as if they might have committed a robbery. It is possible that the robbers of the Brownsville jewelry store are the ones that attempted to enter S. H. Friendly's store in this city Monday night.

MARRIED.

At the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. M. J. Edmondson, in Eugene, this forenoon at 11 o'clock, Miss Grace Margaret Edmondson, of Eugene, and George Ohter, of Astoria, Nev. J. S. McCallum officiating. The couple left on the afternoon train for a trip north.

The bridal couple took the train at Springfield Junction, driving there in a cab, thinking to avoid the usual showers of rice, but a carryall load of guests followed them and rode to Eugene with them in the Pullman car.

BAND CONCERT

The Eugene Military Band will play for the lawn social at R. McMurphy's, at head of Willamette street, just above the depot, Thursday night. Don't stand outside—come in and pay your way, only 10 cents, and get a glimpse of fairyland.

On the Stulaw for $1800. Get the deed from the Oregon Land Company, Gross Hotel. 113

EUGENE MUST RAISE AMOUNT BY SATURDAY

A conference was held by the members of the Stulaw railroad soliciting committee and Mr. Carver this morning at which it was agreed to close up the work Saturday morning. If the lists foot up $50,000 or more at that time Mr. Carver will go ahead with the construction of the railroad according to the terms of his proposition; if there still remains a deficiency in the amount the matter will be formally closed and the effort given up.

Mr. Carver expects his rails for the first fifteen miles of road to arrive in Portland in a few days, unless there is some unlooked for delay in transit, and feels that he can wait no longer for a decision. He has already spent nearly two months in Eugene and the people have had every opportunity to accept his proposition if they so desire. If the effort here fails he will quite likely build into the timber district, but will choose some place on the Southern Pacific nearer the objective point than Eugene.

The committee intends to put in the time until Saturday morning working harder than ever and ask the assistance of every loyal resident of this city. They feel that the case is urgent and every effort should be put forth to secure the amount necessary to bring the railroad to Eugene.

A Convenient Wood Box.

"Grandma, tell us a story."
"What kind of a story?"
"Oh, tell us about something that happened when you were a girl on the old plantation."

"Well, I'll tell you about the moment of greatest suspense of my whole life." The old lady laid aside her work, took a girl on one knee, a boy on the other, and the rest clung to the big chair.

"Long before any of you were born," she began, "the negroes were slaves. When the great war that freed them came on, they all left us except Uncle Ben. Many of them left us before they were proclaimed free, but Uncle Ben didn't. He stayed with us all through those terrible times and was very useful in helping us to keep what the northern soldiers wanted to take from us."

"There was a young fellow—he was between boy and man—living on a plantation near ours whom I liked very much. He was seventeen, and so was I. His name was George. One day George came to the house very much excited and told us that the Federal army was coming and the soldiers were taking everything they could get their hands on. We must hide what they could eat or carry away."

"We called Ben into the house—we were in the kitchen at the time—and asked him if he knew of any place where we could put things to keep the Yankee soldiers from finding them. We suggested the well, but he said so much had been hidden in wells that a well was the first place a soldier would look for plunder. We talked of hollow trees, bushes and such like, but Ben wouldn't listen to using any of them. He said the best place in which to hide things from a soldier was right under his nose."

"Suddenly he sprang for a big wood box we kept in the kitchen beside the stove. He threw out the wood, then got his tools—he was a good carpenter, Ben was—and made a new bottom to the box about a third of the way from the top. Beneath was a vacant space big enough to hold two or three trunks. Ben made an opening in this lower part by nailing a couple of the boards so loosely that we could pull out the nails with our fingers. As soon as he had finished his work we put all our valuables in the lower part and filled the upper part with wood, so that no one would suspect there was anything but wood in the box."

"We had scarcely finished when we heard a distant clatter of horses' hoofs. At the same time George ran in white as a sheet and said he had been with a party of citizens who had fired on the Federal troops. They were chasing him and if they caught him would likely hang him, for soldiers don't treat citizens the same as soldiers; citizens are expected to take no part in war. "George's danger drove the red out of my cheeks in an instant. I had a lot of it then, though I haven't any now. Like a flash, I took the loose boards out of the wood box. George got into the lower part, though there was little room left, and I put back the boards and the nails just in time to prevent a lot of mounted soldiers who rode up to the kitchen door from seeing me do it. One of them came in and asked where that bushwhacker was—the soldiers called fighting citizens bushwhackers—who had been firing on his men. I told him to look for himself, and he searched the house from garret to cellar."

"He didn't find George, and finally, in order to divert his attention, I told him I'd got him up something to eat. That tempted him, and I got some bacon out of the cupboard and fried it, with a couple of potatoes. I also made some coffee—that is, chicory; we had no coffee, because the blockade of the coast prevented our getting any in from abroad where it grows. I offered him a chair, but he preferred to sit on the wood box. That scared me so that it was all I could do to attend to my cooking. Then he began to drum with his heels on the side of the box, which gave out a hollow sound. I ran to the box for some wood. He got down while I lifted the lid and took out a stick. Then he got up and went to dressing again. I rushed for another stick and kept taking so much wood that he finally took the chair I had offered him."

"All this time I was in agony. I didn't care if they found the valuables, George being so much more important. Every minute I feared he would be obliged to cough or move and betray his location, but no sound came from the wood box. I'd made such a hot fire putting on so much wood that before I knew it, pronounced as I was, the bacon was burned to a crisp, and the potatoes, too, for that matter. The man said if I hadn't been such a good looking girl he'd have sent me down for a fool. There were no more bacon and potatoes except in the wood box, so I poured coffee for him and the men outside. Then they rode away."

"When George came out he could scarcely stand for the strain he had been under, and as far as I fell down on the floor in a heap. George didn't do any more firing on the troops as a citizen. He joined the southern army and at the close of the war came out an officer. That's his sword hanging there over the mantel."

"Grandpa?" exclaimed every child at once.
"Grandpa," replied the old lady, and in her eye one might see a picture of a far past. GERTRUDE GOWAN.

..DENTISTRY..

It is not necessary to lose your teeth in this day and age if you give a dentist with modern methods a chance to save them.

Why extract them, because they ache? Why get rid of them when they start to decay? Do you realize that the teeth are a part of the body the same as the finger, the eye or ear? They have their function to fulfill. It is indeed a very important function; if it is not well performed the rest of the human organism suffers. Your food half masticated throws the half done work onto the stomach to complete.

Overwork the stomach, in time you have indigestion: indigestion produces an ugly disposition. Why not then have the teeth all filled and where they have been extracted replaced by bridge work. If they are in a condition that can not be cured, have them extracted and teeth on plates made to replace them. We fill teeth by our late methods without pain. We also extract them without pain.
