W. C. T. U. CORRESPONDENCE

(By Josephine Hull, Press Cor.)
Now, there was a certain woman exceedingly beautiful and well favored above all her sisters. And she had an adversary who for a long time had troubled her. He robbed her treasury, laid waste her fields, and carried away her subjects into captivity.

Then she cried unto her friends with a loud voice, "Remove from the midst of my enemy, Bacchus, for with his deceptions and crooked ways and subtleties I am sore vexed. Tear down now his stronghold, take away the pillars of his castle, that he may find no place of refuge, neither a place of retreat." And her friends harkened unto her and it was done.

Then Bacchus grew very angry and he called unto him his chief captains and lieutenants, and said unto them, "Behold, now The Woman has taken away from us much profit, she has persecuted and scattered and even cast into prison many of our people; therefore let us call to our aid those of the baser sort and let us afflict her, that she shall repent of this she has done, and weary with her many vexations she return again unto her old ways. And they all said

"Amen," and they did as was commanded them.

And The Woman's consort waxed old and passed away, and she took unto herself another husband. "Surely now," said she, "I shall be delivered from my enemy Bacchus."

But lo, in the very commencement of the honeymoon the enemy began to multiply and grow bolder. The rumble of their wheels was heard upon the streets of the city. And their traffic was carried on in allies and back offices and barns and even they burrowed in the ground. Then The Woman's friends entreated them and too them to their husbands and said, "See here," and "Lo there." But the husband said "Go to now be very careful, for am I not a guardian over The Woman's treasury?"

Then The Woman arose and said: "Attend now unto this matter, for I may not endure this longer. And the husband said, "Be not offended with me, neither angry, for am I not in the employ of Bacchus, your enemy? But behold, I shall be very generous and very gracious unto you. Seek ye now an other counsel and I shall put my hand into my pocket and bring forth the gold wherewith to recompense him."

Then The Woman said, "Oh, my husband, were you not to defend me? Why then did you take me with you to wife?"

The husband said, "Behold, have you not my name? And concerning all little matters will I not defend you? Yea, with my very life's blood will I defend you—one against another. But pertaining to the matter of Bacchus and other great corporations, that have much gold and silver and powerful influence, am I not retained by them and must I not see to their interests? Therefore you shall be my treasurer and I your receiver, and peradventure there shall be any time when your interests do not conflict with those before mentioned, and it seemeth good to me, then am I at your service, and remember, I am always your receiver."

This is the parable of The Woman.

OREGON WILL HAVE THE BEST CROPS

According to G. B. Lanham, purchasing agent for Wagner & Co., a commission firm of Chicago, Oregon fruit crop prospects are a shade better this year than most of the other fruit growing states. Mr. Lanham has been making a tour of the fruit growing districts in the north and middle west and states that the Colorado crop was saved this year by the use of heating pots kept going there for a week or ten days during the period when the late spring frosts came. In Oregon Mr. Lanham looks for an average crop of apples, with peaches and cherries short. He visited the big strawberry growing sections in the south and southwest before starting on his western trip, and says the berries this year hit the high mark for prices and looks for one of the best berry seasons in a number of years. The market for box apples as packed and put up in the northwest, and particularly at Hood River, Mr. Lanham says, is expanding more rapidly than it can be supplied and he looks for a greater demand for them this year than ever before.
