

NEWS OF BUSY SPRINGFIELD

HUGE LETTERS TO ADVERTISE CITY

Springfield intends to follow in the steps of Tacoma. On the back of the town, and which fronts miles and miles of railroad track, will be erected a huge electric sign 120 feet long and 12 feet high, "S-P-R-I-N-G-F-I-E-L-D." Tonight the first money in the direction of paying for the bill will be donated from the receipts of the social dance.

Several real-estate men will pay the cost of the electricity to keep the huge letters ablaze.

BEST PLANING MILL
IN LANE COUNTY

The Springfield Planing Mill Company has completed an addition to its planing mill of over 5000 square feet and added new machinery and equipment, until now it claims to have the best-equipped planing mill in Lane county. Moreover, the company intends to add more machinery. Business has been so good that the mill is behind in its orders.

NEW SAWMILL WILL BE RUNNING BY JANUARY 1

Fischer & Bally, who are building a new structure near the railroad track running down the east side of the Willamette valley will have the machinery moved from Marcola some time this fall and begin to turn out their thirty thousand feet of lumber a day before the first of next year. The sawmill part of the structure will be 120x24-30 feet, and the planing mill 50x30 feet. The pond is dug, and the well drilled to furnish water for the pond and engine. The logs will be brought down from the Mohawk.

RAILROAD PAYROLL
HELP TO SPRINGFIELD

Secretary Walker, of the Commercial Club, estimates that the Southern Pacific payroll in Springfield is $2000 or more a month. Outside of the crew on the Wendling train he says that the railroad employees draw $2000.

E. R. Wells, an architect who has made his headquarters in Eugene for some time, but who has furnished plans and specifications for many of the late business and residence buildings in Springfield, has decided to locate here and has made arrangements.

News Mistaken
The Springfield News says: Springfield is now receiving on an average of 35 cars of freight a day at the local depot, which is more than will be received locally in our sister town, Eugene, in a week. Monday 38 carloads were received, making the total cash receipts for the day for the Southern Pacific freight office $11,500. There were also 19 cars of lumber and other merchandise billed out from the local depot on the same day.

The News is deceived. Eugene papers do not report every class of goods, and the shipping clerk usually looks through a pile of fifty bills for cars to get four or five that the reporter takes.

Springfield Prices
Cherries off the market.
Peas, 4s per lb.

Local Notes
C. H. Humphrey, the new miller for S. K. Noel, has taken charge of the grinding.

Mrs. Nickerson is turning her old shop into a house. It is on the west end of Main street.

"The demand for barley seems inexhaustible," says Mrs. S. K. Noel in speaking of the trade of the flouring mill. "We have a carload coming from Portland to relieve the local market."

Mrs. W. E. Clark, of Polk county, visited her daughter, Mrs. R. A. Washburne, this week. Yesterday she left for a visit with another daughter, Mrs. Nat Burch, who lives three miles south of Springfield.

"Bante" VanValzah is score keeper for the Springfield team. He is also a University student.

T. B. Foster is building a house on the hill. He works for the Booth-Kelly Lumber Company. Professor Reichart is also building a fine home on the mountain. The hill is situated to become a prominent residence district ten years hence.

Born—To Mr. and Mrs. Thomas I. Marshall, July 14, 1909, a son, weight nine pounds.

Mrs. Alex Gray, of Thurston, is very ill with heart trouble.

His Inexcusable
Act.

By ANDREW E. EWING.

[Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.]

Swinging on a hotel porch among the Swiss Alps in August with my Uncle George, both of us gazing up at a glacier winding its way to the valley, I noticed a sad look in his eye.

"Doesn't the view invigorate you, Uncle?" I asked.

"I've been thinking, Billy," he replied.

"Of what?"

"Our contemptible natures."

I knew my uncle was a pessimist. Most old men are. I made no reply.

"When I was your age," he continued, "I gave way to a weakness—a good many weaknesses, but one especially right here in these mountains. At the time to have confessed it would have been a strain on me. Now my act seems nothing more than what might be expected from a descendant of that half brute, half savage, called prehistoric man."

"But there are redeeming traits."

"I wish I could see them in my case."

"Well, tell your story. I'm sure you have one to tell."

"I was in this region with a party of tourists. Bob Southwick, a classmate of mine in college, had come over with me, and we were doing these mountainous foot. Bob was a great climber, while I preferred to look at the mountains from a distance, as we are doing now. The party I mention joined us here. Among them was a girl of nineteen, and Bob fell in love with her. Then he was called away to Paris for awhile, and during his absence I—well, I cut him out with the girl."

My uncle paused and seemed to feed again after an interval of forty years the degradation of his act.

"When George came back, as was to be expected, there was constraint between him and the girl. George seemed to be in a mental fever; but strange to say, it showed itself toward her and not at all toward me. But I found out afterward that he didn't know what I'd been up to and I hadn't the manliness to tell him. At any rate, he was hot for climbing and wanted me to go with him. The very day after his return, he wanted me to make a trip as far up the glacier as we could go between daylight and dark. I didn't wish to go, and I didn't like to refuse. To stay behind with the girl I had robbed him of seemed to add to my contemptible conduct. I consented to go."

"We started at 4 o'clock the next morning, taking axes and a rope for making difficult passages. We climbed over those places that from here look a trifle rough up there we found them, at times impassable—proceeding on our way till noon. Then we stopped, and ate our lunch, after which we started to put in another hour on the upward course before returning."

"Coming to a crevasse perhaps six feet across, we determined to jump it. We fastened the rope about our waists, and Bob jumped first. The other side was steep and somewhat soft; but Bob after some stamping and cutting with his ax got a foothold. Then I jumped and struck snow. I felt myself going backward and tried to get ashore on projecting ice with my ax. I failed. Bob saw what was coming and braced himself for the shock. I went over."

Another pained look came to the old man's face.

"The rope held. Bob was dragged; a few feet and then got a firmer foothold, but a precarious one. There was no possibility of his pulling me up, and if the strain continued I would soon drag him over. We talked together about the prospect, he trying to encourage me. I knew I had to go to the bottom and it depended upon me whether or not I dragged Bob with me. I'd done one mean act toward him, and I couldn't bring myself to drag him down with me, especially when it wouldn't save me. I put my hand in my pocket, took out my knife and, breathing a prayer that my soul should be received in the other world, cut the rope."

Another pause. I saw my uncle shudder.

"I heard something between a shriek and a groan from Bob. To my astonishment, I fell only about thirty feet and landed in soft snow. I was buried up to my armpits. Of course I called up to Bob that I was all right, and I shall never forget the 'Thank God!' I heard him utter."

"Well, there I was, stuck in snow at the bottom of a crevasse, with no means of getting out. The rope wasn't long enough by half to reach me. Bob, of course was enabled to secure his own position, or, rather, to jump in the other side of the crevasse. He jumped safely, and we held a parlay. There seemed nothing to do but for him to go down to the hotel for assistance and a rope. Fortunately some one there was watching us through a glass, saw the accident and met him on the way. In the middle of the afternoon I was drawn up."

We sat for a few moments in silence. I overwhelmed with the utter absence of consciousness on the part of my uncle of his heroism; then I said:

"What did your friend say about your cutting the rope?"

"He never thought to examine the cut. He supposed the rope had broken."

"And didn't you tell him?"

"No. What was the use?"

Again I was lost in astonishment.

"And the girl?" I asked presently.

"Oh, the girl! Well, she fooled us both."

"Uncle," I said after another pause, "if you were conscious of being a hero, I suppose you wouldn't be one."

SENATORS AND OTHER NOTABLES AT WRIGHT AEROPLANE TESTS.

Nearly every member of the senate and house of representatives visited Port Moyer at one time or another during the Wright aeroplane tests. Vice President Sherman and Senator Elkins are ardent believers in the adaptability of the aeroplane to use in the army, and both made several pilgrimages to Port Moyer to watch the wonderful machine. These photographs were taken during the recent tests. Senators Overman and Aldrich are in the upper group, and those in the lower picture from left to right are Vice President Sherman, Senator Elkins, Colonel Garmack, ex-Speaker J. Warren Keifer and Major Squier.
