INTERESTING EDUCATIONAL PICTURE AT SHELL THEATRE TONIGHT AND TUESDAY

The series of pictures which is called "The Fly Pest," shows flies (as big as Plymouth Rock hens, as they appear on the screen) laying eggs in putrid meat; the eggs in white masses; the maggots in writhing heaps as they emerge from the eggs, and in different stages of their growth until they burrow in the dirt to enter the pupa state. The pupae (or grubs) themselves, one day later, are next shown; flies emerging from the filth, at first wingless, then the perfect adult fly. Then follow pictures, stretching across the screen, of a fly taking a sip of honey from the point of a needle, showing the action of the proboscis, very like an elephant's trunk in miniature; of the tongue, and of the foot, also enormously enlarged, and with every microscopic hair distinct.

The second act of this little life-history is entitled "How Flies Carry Contagion," and in it these scenes follow one another in rapid succession, so that the thoughtless spectator cannot fail to grasp their full significance! Flies swarming on putrid fish; crawling over lumps of sugar; in a cuspidor; on the nipple of a baby's feeding bottle, and, last of all, a pretty baby placidly sucking the mouthpiece from whence the flies have just departed.
