

JUDGE LINDSEY LECTURES ON THE "BAD" BOY

Great Crowd Greet Denver
Man At Central Presbyterian Church

There was a large crowd at the Central Presbyterian church last night to listen to Judge Lindsey, the "kids' judge" at Denver, in his lecture on "The Boy and How to Handle Him, or The Misfortunes of Mickey." Judge Lindsey's face is familiar in feature from photographs in newspapers and magazines, but the camera could not show the play of the whimsical eyes and mouth, nor the quick changes from grave to gay, from lively to severe. His voice is high pitched and penetrating.

The speaker began by citing the size of the assembly as an indication of the interest taken by its members in the children of the nation, for the problem of the child today is the problem of the man and woman of ten years hence. It showed, also, that the nation was awakening to its duty to the child. Hitherto the nation assumed to deal with the child violator of the law. But to save the child appeal must be made to the home, the school, the church.

Beginning of Work for Boys
Judge Lindsey's experience with the child lawbreaker began 10 years ago, when the district attorney applied while a case was being tried before him for a 5-minute interval to dispose of a case of burglary. No burglar was in sight, but three urchins, ragged and torn, grimy and miserable, seated, side by side, in the jury box, stood up when their names were called. Robbery from a box car was the charge.

"Tell us about it, Mickey," said the judge. "What about this burglary?"

"I ain't no burglar, judge," said Mickey. "We thought there was some watermelons in the car, and when we got in we found no watermelons, judge, but there was some boxes that had bottles in them, so we got one out and drank it."

So when Mickey pleaded for mercy on the ground that they had suffered enough, the judge admitted the force of the plea and let them off for that time.

So, said the speaker, the boys were in the wrong, but was not the state in the wrong also? Was it not wanting in its duty to the boys?

The judge's sympathy won Mickey's trust, and he opened his heart to his friend. Therein loyalty to the gang was the only loyalty he knew. Truth and honesty to his mates were the only commandments to bind him. To steal, to lie, outside the gang, were not forbidden by his special conscience. The time came when Mickey and his mates came to the judge of their own free will. They learned that "snitching"—angling, telling on oneself—was on the square. So the real conscience was awakened.

Results of the Honor System
Thus it has come about that 530 boys, sent on their honor to the detention home, alone, unbound, unwatched, reported their arrival, and not one missed. During the same time the police have taken prisoners to jail, and 41 of them escaped between court and penitentiary. So the equipment provided for the boy by the new methods is best described as moral efficiency. Fear is the father of lies. The state and its police have developed fear. This must be cast out by sympathy. Therein is the true trust, and thence truth.

Never let a boy get away with a lie, said the speaker—he gentle, be patient and persevering till the truth comes out, even if by slow degrees.

Much of the boy's trouble comes from misdirected energy, much from fun, which often crosses the law's boundary. Arouse the boy's interest—provide him and his mates with playgrounds in the open air. From kindergarten to trade schools, keep his hands at work—so will play become work for him, and then work play.

These Are the Forces That Save
Meanwhile the forces which save the child are the home, the school, the church. Neither school nor church can usurp the functions of the home. If, and only if, the home fails in its duty to the child, the nation must take charge. Religion is the strength of the nation, yet the church cannot fill in the children the place of the home.

In any case the state is responsible that the conditions of the child's life are healthy and conducive to growth. Inconsistent, then, with this view the congested dwellings and the stoma of the city, the evictions of child labor in mine and factory.

The physiology of the child is less than its psychology, must be understood and provided for by the state as part of its duty to the child.

These points, emphasized by countless full stories of his home, kept the audience still and interested during the nearly two hours that the lecture lasted. Judge Lindsey closing as he began, with an earnest plea for better understanding of the boy.

ATTENTION W. O. W.
This evening, January 12th, the Woodmen of the World will install their officers for the term. The Women of Woodcraft will install on the same evening. All members of both orders are requested to be present.
