that competition in armaments shall absolutely cease and that an international reign of peace shall be established. In his judgment, it is precisely the German failure to appreciate the mind of other nations that has precipitated Germany and the world into the present appalling struggle. Professor Foerster insists that the peace that is coming will not be a matter of haggling and "trumping." He declares that this is the mightiest moral problem that has ever confronted humanity, and the inexorable moral condition of the conclusion of peace is so glaringly patent that outside of Germany even those governed by purely material interests recognize that all future economic security and prosperity depend upon "the final and unambiguous triumph of a new heart and mind."

A Story of Married Life REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

By Adele Garrison

Why Did Lillian Say, "I Want Harry, Decorating the Landscape When Miss Draper Arrives?"

"Wa'al, Farmer Graham, how do you do? And Missis Graham, too? Wa'al, I do declare, you hev a right peart place here!"

Harry Underwood, his shoulders bowed, his face thrust forward into what he fondly imagined to be a clever burlesque of a Yankee farmer, looked out from the taxicab which had just brought him and Lillian for the week's visit she had promised me.

"I'm so glad you have that off your chest at last," Lillian said dryly, as Dicky helped her down and directed the driver to take the bags to the house. "He's been practicing it all the way down on the train. I was just at the point of arising and explaining that the case was not dangerous and no one need be alarmed, when the conductor called Marvin."

"Sad what jealousy will do to an otherwise fairly normal intellect, isn't it?" Harry Underwood bent over my outstretched hand with such a ludicrously confidential air that I could not help laughing outright. He gave me a quick, shrewd glance at the sound, then crushed the hand, grinning mischievously as I started.

"Not so angry at me as you were the last time I saw you, are you, loveliest one?" he murmured with the exaggerated air I so dislike in him, then turned to Dicky as Lillian unceremoniously shouldered him aside.

"Don't trot that stuff out until later," she admonished him coolly. "You've got your cues mixed. That's the speech you should pull about 10 p. m. on the beach in the moonlight. Run along and cheep with the Dicky-bird for a while. Mrs. Graham and I have something important to talk about."

"Meaning another woman, of course," he guessed shrewdly. "Poor thing! I'll bet she'll be grilled to a charcoal by the time you two get through with her."

"There won't be even a tiny ash left of you if you don't get away from here," threatened Lillian grimly, and with a boisterous laugh her husband joined Dicky and left us for a moment alone.

"How goes it?" she whispered, kissing me warmly.

"Fairly well," I returned. "I'll tell you all about it when we go upstairs. You can't get anywhere now until Dicky does the honors. He quite fancies himself as a landed proprietor, even if the place is only a rented one. So prepare yourself for a rhapsody or two."

"You forget that I've heard him before. Come along."

We hurried upstairs and I showed Lillian the rooms I had prepared for her and her husband. I had left Dicky's room in the front undisturbed, for he had so many things in it that it was impossible to arrange it for guests. I had given my own room to Lillian, and intended to install Harry in the room occupied by my mother-in-law when she was home. I had a little mental shiver as I recalled the only time my mother-in-law had ever seen Harry Underwood, at the Aquarium the day after her arrival. He had been distinctly under the influence of drink at that time, and she had scored him roundly. What would she say if she knew he was to sleep in her cherished mahogany four-poster?

"What a wonderful view!" Lillian exclaimed, stepping to the window of my room and looking at the rolling woodland I loved so well. She stood drinking it in for a moment, and then turning sat down on the side of the bed and drew me down beside her.

"Now, tell me about it; every word. I have worried so about you this week."

"There isn't much to tell," I returned. "I have tried my best to follow your instructions, but while Miss Draper accepts my invitations, it is she who is now cool and repellent. She seems actually sullen, somewhat. I do not believe I can express it in any other way."

"A Risky Thing."

"Good!" Lillian said briskly. "Dicky's sidestepping her, that's the trouble. How is the Dicky-bird behaving, any way?"

"He missed that train he always takes with her twice this week, and didn't even seem annoyed," I replied demurely.

Lillian threw back her head and laughed. "You'll do," she said. "All you needed was to be given a little start. Tell me, when does the lady join our little party?"

"She has promised to come over this afternoon late for a little tennis, if we play, and dinner afterward. Of course, she will spend the evening. I confess I am anxious to see what Dicky will do when it comes time for her to go home."

"Why?"

"Then I told her the tale of the trolley trip dinner the week before, of the ride homeward, when I had asked Dicky to take me home first and then go on with Miss Draper, and of the calm manner in which Dicky had sent her home in the taxi and remained with me, to her evident discomfiture."

"When I had finished, Lillian looked grave."

"That turned out splendidly, but it was a risky thing to do. Never send an impressionable man to escort a beautiful girl home along a country road on a summer evening. He simply can't help but make love to her."

"A Handsome Devil."

"I was afraid that the reason Dicky sent her home alone was fear of trusting himself in such dangerous proximity rather than a desire to stay with me."

"Don't torture yourself thinking things like that," she said sharply. "Let me tell you something, Dicky Graham never did anything he didn't want to do in his life. That's the trouble with him. He wanted to stay with you, and he stayed. If he had wanted to go with her, he would have gone, if a hundred wives barred the way."

"Imagine Dicky with a hundred wives," I giggled. "Until I heard her reassuring words, I had not realized how much I had suffered in my worry over Dicky's decision to stay with me and send Miss Draper home on the night in question. I felt a bit hysterical, but Lillian took hold of my hands and quieted the silly laughter which threatened to go on interminably."

"Look here," she said, "you've done splendidly, but you don't need to worry a bit more. Your Uncle Dudley, otherwise your Aunt Dudley, is strictly on the job for this week. All you will have to do will be to carry out instructions. Now, the first thing, don't urge me to play tennis, anything more than the conventional invitation you will be bound to give me. I do not play well. I shall have the chance to catch up with some reading I've been longing to do for months while the rest of you play and—I can watch the little comedy and put a deft finger into the pie better if I am on the outside."

"That being the real reason, you dear," I drew her close and kissed her. "Never mind that. Just one more question, and I'll primp up a bit and we'll rejoin the boys. What time does Greece, the beautiful artist's model, arrive?"

"Oh, I suppose about 3 o'clock. We lunch at 1, and begin to play about two hours afterward."

"She answered the inquiry I did not utter."

"Oh, I just want to be sure Harry is in his tennis togs, decorating the landscape when she arrives. Harry is such a handsome devil in flannels."

SOUTHERN PACIFIC LINES

ANOTHER KIND OF I. W. W.

WILLIAM S. SCOTT, president of the Missouri and Illinois company, which leases coal mines near Belleville, Illinois, yesterday testified at the inquiry into the Missouri coal trade, that it is the policy of the coal men to make all they can, both in war and in peace. Asked as to his ideas of a fair profit during war, he said: "There is no limit. We get what we can. Everybody is doing that, including the farmer."

BUT ONE WAY TO PEACE

THE reply of the United States to the Pope's peace proposal will be sent independently and not in connection with any answer from the other belligerents, according to an announcement made in Washington. There is every reason to believe that it will be fully in accord with the replies of the entente allies, however.
