YOUR DUTY AT HOME

THE WAR SAVINGS CAMPAIGN has been organized upon a wide scale. The attention of every American of any age is called to the privilege, the duty, the necessity of serving themselves and the country by saving the pennies as we must save crumbs—enough pennies equal a valuable War Savings stamp or a Liberty Bond, as enough crumbs equal in food value a loaf of bread. The buying of War Savings stamps is a duty of those at home and nowhere have we seen a clearer statement of the purposes of the War Savings and Thrift campaign than stated in an article by R. F. Wormwood, an eastern publisher. He states:

"As a result of years of continued material prosperity, the United States has come to be known as a nation of spenders. The people, as a rule, have earned their money much more easily than have the people of any other country, and because they have never been taught by grim necessity to be thrifty, they have been lavish in expenditures. One of the results of the war now raging, and a result of by no means the least importance in America, will be the inculcation of the thrift habit through a course of lessons beginning with the fundamentals and proceeding with the successive grades as the war continues. And beyond the higher grades is a post-graduate course where thrift, which now involves practically no lessening of comfort, will merge into want and suffering if we are forced to accept a peace made in Germany.

"To avoid that necessity your government calls upon you for assistance. This call comes to many who are able and willing to interpose their lives between their homes and the German menace, but it comes to very many more who, by reason of age or condition, must respond in some other way than by joining the fighting forces in training camps or on the battle field. Roughly speaking, the battles of this great war are being fought by those who risk their lives in the trenches, aided by those who risk a comparatively small part of their material comfort and convenience while they remain at home.

"As no war in the world's history has ever before been fought for such enormous stakes, so no previous war has ever been so lavish in expenditure of men and money. At present our government has an ample supply of men at command, but it needs help to pay its running expenses. The richest nation in the world, the United States always inclined toward the ways of peace, has never possessed a great war chest, and in the present emergency it must depend upon the people for financial assistance. And the people are responding nobly. Through taxes and contributions to various war loans the wealthy have been doing their duty, while the poorer people have done and are doing their share, perhaps less conspicuously but not less effectively, and even more impressively when unity of will and purpose is considered.

"As a direct incentive to thrift, the government has placed War Savings stamps on sale, thus giving an opportunity to invest in a government obligation of small denomination. In no imaginable way could a more convenient form of assistance have been devised. It involves no great sacrifices; it involves no great degree of haste in order to be effective; it does not demand the withdrawal of the money of the people from the channels of necessary trade and industry. It merely asks the people to avoid profusion and wastefulness and then invest the consequent savings in a government promise to pay, bearing a rate of interest that makes the investment gilt-edged, considering the security behind it. By this means every man, woman and child in the United States is, individually and collectively, given the opportunity to know and feel that they are personally and directly helping to establish human liberty and a democratic form of government upon a firmer foundation than they have ever before occupied.

"From every hill and valley, from every city, town, neighborhood and community in this broad land the financial streams are flowing toward their destination in the United States treasury. These streams may be small at their source, but they increase in volume as they proceed on their course, and their combined flood will be no small contribution to the ocean whose waves shall finally overwhelm the enemies of a peace established on the sure foundation of right and justice.

"This is your war as much as it is the war of the men who serve their country in the army and navy. They must be clothed and fed and provided with arms and ammunition, and it is the duty of those who stay at home to see that nothing essential to a successful prosecution of the war is lacking. You are not asked to give money to the government, but to loan it with the assurance that it will be returned with added interest. Pay your war taxes as a patriotic duty; in any event, save to the utmost of your ability and buy War Savings stamps and Liberty Loan bonds, for in no other way can you be of so much assistance to your government in its time of need."

A Story of Married Life REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

By Adele Garrison

Why Does Dicky Receive the Incriminating Letter So Calmly?

Over and over again I read the contents of the crumpled paper I had picked up in the hall after Dicky had burned the papers in his waste basket. It was not long before I had no need of reading it, for I knew its contents, as children would say, "by heart, forward and backward and upside down."

I do not remember ever in my life being so puzzled by anything as I was when trying to decipher the real meaning of the fragment of a love letter which had been written in a feminine hand and then copied on the same sheet with a few changes by my husband.

It was so melodramatic a thing, its wording so flatteringly extravagant that it might have been taken bodily from an old-fashioned "ten-twenty-thirty." I could not bring myself to believe that it was really meant for Dicky, or that it was in any manner connected with Edith Fairfax, the Virginia art student, whose friendship for my husband had troubled me a great deal in the last few months.

She was so delicate, so ethereal a creature, so much the gentlewoman, that I could not associate words so turgid and torrid with her.

And yet something told me that the feminine hand which had traced the lines confronting me was that of no other than the girl from Virginia. In my years of high school teaching many girls had passed through my hands, and I had an unusual opportunity to study all varieties of ciphers. Some of my girls had come to me from southern private schools, and there had always been a "something different" in their handwriting which I had remarked, and which now stared up at me from the fragment of a letter in my hand.

What Madge Did.

I tried to look at the thing dispassionately, to tell myself that there must be some explanation of the thing, no matter how bizarre it might be. But recollections of Dicky's frequent "engagements with art editors," his growing absorption in this work or whatever it was in his room, his order that neither Kate nor I should even dust the furniture and the elaborate air of secrecy which he had thrown around the papers in his waste basket when he burned them—all these things pointed to some secret which my husband feared or was ashamed to tell me.

Father of Eugene Woman Is Burned to Death in Kansas

M. V. Wright, father of Mrs. Omar R. Gullion, of Eugene, was burned to death in a hotel fire at Kinsley, Kan., Wednesday, but the fact was not known until his body was found in debris Saturday night, according to a telegram received yesterday by Mrs. Gullion.

Mr. Wright was 78 years of age and a retired farmer, residing at Norborne, Mo. He visited his farm near Kinsley every summer.

Mr. Wright is survived by five other sons and daughters, James Wright, of Waco, Tex.; Goodson Wright, of Kinsley, Kan.; Mrs. Leota Miller, of Woodbury, Ore.; Otto Wright and Miss Donna Wright, of Norborne.

A primitive, jealous anger rose in me. Impulses which I did not recognize, which seemed those of another woman thronged upon me. I wanted to tear my hair, my clothing, to scream aloud, to summon Dicky and overwhelm him with virago-like wrath.

Of course, I did none of these things, but the effort to suppress them robbed me of the poise and self-control which would have enabled me to ignore the incident altogether and trust to time for its clearing up. Still shaking from the emotional storm which had swept me, I picked up the piece of paper with its florid amorous protestations, and went swiftly to Dicky's door.

At my knock I heard an angry exclamation, then a sharp, quick "who's there?"

"It is I, Madge," I returned, trying vainly to make my voice steady.

I could hear him rise and come to the door. He unlocked it, opened it only far enough for him to come out into the hall and closed it behind him.

A Natural Question.

"Well, what's the row?" he asked shortly. I saw that his eyes were bright, his hair rumpled, his forehead dewed with perspiration as they always are when he is engaged in working out some illustration. I wondered for a moment if he really were drawing as he used to do. An instant's reflection assured me of my mistake. Dicky never shut me out from his work. Indeed, he often called me to look at some detail of his drawing, especially if it concerned some item of women's dress, and asked my opinion of it.

I held the crumpled piece of paper out to him.

Here is something from your waste basket which dropped in the hall," I said, and in my endeavor to control my voice I realized that it was grim and cold.

He started as he saw it, and involuntarily smoothed it out and saw what was written upon it. Then he crushed it angrily in his hand, opened his mouth to speak, thought better of it, and turned toward his door.

The calm manner in which he ignored the piece of paper which had caused me so much uneasiness was like a lighted match applied to a particularly inflammable piece of tinder.

"Don't you think you owe me an explanation of that very interesting missive?" I asked.
