A STORY OF MARRIED LIFE REVELATIONS OF A WIFE.

Why Madge Felt That Mother Graham's Comfort Creed is Uncomfortable. I made a sudden swift decision as I heard my mother-in-law wonder what I could have said to her cousin to make her weep so tempestuously.

Your cousin made me exceedingly angry, mother. I began nervously, and I fear I said something very rude, very cruel to her. She probably is in no mood to see me or I would apologize to her, but won't you ask her for me to consider our conversation as having never taken place?

"She's a Poor Stick." "Then you know—" I said in amazement. "That Katie is going to have a baby?" returned my mother-in-law, tartly. "Why of course."

"But that's neither here nor there," she went on briskly. "It's none of Agatha's business if Katie has six children, all twins. And I'll tell her so when she gets over her crying spell."

"Please, mother," I said, emboldened by her championship of me to call her by that sacred name, "don't say anything cross to her. Just tell her how sorry I am."

"Not much I won't!" my mother-in-law replied briskly. "You'd have her walking all over you. But I'll give her your first message to consider your conversation as not having taken place. You must have told her to leave, for nothing less would have made such an impression on her."

"I had no time either for remorse or for reflection. My mother-in-law with her usual driving practicality, looked around my room. "All packed ready to move, I see," she said. "Where are you going to put Agatha to sleep? You know I cannot have her in my room."

"I shall fix up this room again," I replied, trying to make my tone heartily cordial. "It won't take very long."

"Don't fuss so much," she said. "If you get the bed up and the dresser and the rug in place the rest of the things won't matter."

"I could not repress a smile as she went out. She would defend me against unpleasantness from any one else, but she was supremely indifferent to the inconvenience I might suffer in getting my room ready for her cousin. She had never suggested the possibility of Dicky's giving up his room to her cousin and bunking upon an army cot as I was doing. It probably never had occurred to her, but I knew she would have resented it if I had suggested it."

That she and her son must be comfortable, no matter who else was inconvenienced—this I had long ago learned was an incontrovertible article of her life creed.

HUN RUSSIAN POLICY CHANGED

TALK OF ALLIED AID TO RUSSIA has produced one pronounced effect. Germany's "peaceful penetration" is not being pushed so blatantly and even the conservative press is so concerned that it advocates a conciliatory attitude toward Russia and the Bolsheviks as necessary in the interests of Germany's future position.

But the Bolsheviks are still apparently supported by the bulk of the people and German agents have been instructed to oppose them no longer and to assume that Bolshevik rule has come to stay and will not be easily upset by its political enemies.

This writer then refers to a remark made by Premier Lenin in a recent speech, comparing the Soviet republic, pending the outbreak of revolutions in Europe, to a man who has but a small annuity but wants to be secure in possession of it, and observes:

"We shall no doubt be prepared to guarantee him this small and secure annuity. The danger threatens it not from the German side, but from that of the Entente, which altogether grudges him his peace and rest."

Precisely the same policy is advocated even by such an annexationist organ as the Kolnische Volkzeitung. Referring to President Wilson's declaration about Russia, it says:

"All these intimidations do not frighten us, but there is no reason why we should treat lightly the overt and covert intrigues of the Entente in the east. What is necessary is that we should solve the eastern problems as to secure for us permanent peace and rest on our eastern frontier and deprive our enemies of the chance of influencing the by no means exhausted fermentations in the east in a direction injurious to us."
