TWO BANDITS OBTAIN ROAD PATROLMEN $100,000 IN ROBBERY FOR YEAR PICK

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 12.—Two bandits today obtained $100,000 in cash and gems from the safe of the fashionable Washington hotel and escaped.

After holding up the night watchman, the robbers piled open the vault and rifled safety deposit boxes belonging to guests. Two confederates kept vigil outside the hotel. The loot consisted of about $200,000 in cash and checks and the remainder was in diamonds.

SAYS PROFITERS HIT
Washington, D. C., Feb. 13.—The department of justice drive against profiteers is getting results, according to Attorney General Daugherty.

Since the announcement a few weeks ago that special agents for the department would begin taking evidence against retail merchants and distributors guilty of exacting too large profits, "very satisfactory results" have been obtained, he declared. He is in receipt of reports from federal district attorneys throughout the country to the effect that prices generally are tumbling. Where unfavorable reports justify prosecutions will be made, however.

The attorney general also announced that the department of justice investigation of exorbitant profits made by contractors engaged in selling war materials is proceeding satisfactorily.

"There may be additional suits filed within 10 days," he said.

THE RIDDLE OF LORD RIDDELL; HIS WORK AT DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

Upwards of 500 newspaper correspondents representing the press of the world, who came to the capital of the United States to interpret for their home-folks the deliberations of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament and Pacific and Far Eastern questions, are rubbing their eyes and taking stock of what they wrote about the conference with considerable misgiving.

The reason is Lord Riddell.

Lord Riddell spoke for the British government at the arms conference.

Lloyd-George, Premier of the British Empire, sent Lord Riddell to Washington. He was not "officially" connected with the British delegation. He was delightfully unofficial and irresponsible, but he held two conferences a day with the press which was interpreting the conference to the world. When Secretary of State Hughes, bound by the seal of confidence placed on sessions of the arms delegates, could only tell the newspapers he had nothing to say, Lord Riddell in his unofficial position had everything to say. When in tense moments the authoritative news sources were tightly closed, Lord Riddell was always available with his unofficial news. So the bulk of the "news" that went forth from the conference was Lord Riddell's interpretation of the news.

When Arthur Balfour and Lord Lee of Fareham, with deep-toned pathos denounced the submarine as the weapon of cowards, there was no one to point out the American position that the submarine was a vital defensive weapon for the vast coast line of the United States, but Lord Riddell was there to spread broadcast the great humanitarian move that Britain was making in seeking to abolish the submarine. There was no one to point out that the submarine was abolished, Great Britain's vast merchant fleet, capable of being turned into commerce destroyers and privateers overnight, would hold the balance of power at sea. But Lord Riddell was there with plenty of propaganda to support the British position.

The American delegation at the arms conference had no "leak." Lord Riddell was the British leak. As the author of the "Mirrors of Washington" in an article in the Review of Reviews, pointed out:

"He was delightfully irresponsible, having no official connection. He could leak when he had anything to leak. He could guess near the truth or far from the truth, for after all, he was only imagining. He joked. He indulged in buffoonery. He put out propaganda when he wished. So far as there was publicity at the conference, he was that publicity."

So many of the world's journalists are wondering just how far they interpreted the deliberations of the conference for their home folks, and just how far Great Britain, through Lord Riddell, interpreted the conference for them.
