Radio Unsuccessful For Communication In Mine Disasters

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Radio as a means of communication between entombed miners and surface rescue parties has proved impracticable, it was announced today, in a description of bureau of mines experiments extending over several years. High power equipment necessary for communication over distances of 1,000 to 2,000 feet through strata, the bureau said, would be too bulky, heavy and complicated and at the same time too fragile and delicate, for practical requirements. It was stated, however, that there is some promise in the application of "wired wireless" or line radio, which consists of transmission along metallic conductors, such as water pipes, compressed air pipes, power and lighting circuits and mine car tracks.
