Legion Four Sings—The newly-organized American Legion Four, the male quartet now appearing at the Rex with Hugh Winder as a prologue to "Abraham Lincoln," is an unusual singing group because each member has at some time been a vaudeville or professional singer. The tenor, Jerry Valentine, now salesman with the Lane Auto company, was on Pantages time; Jack Kirby, second tenor, was also on Pantages and Orpheum. Ernie Ludlow of Laraway's, was formerly a New York show man and A. Welberg, bass, was with the United States navy quartet. All of these men are legionnaires, and are putting over some good "barber shop" in the moving picture prologue.

'ABRAHAM LINCOLN' IS STRIKING FILM

A fascinating version of history which links together in a picture the outstanding and significant events in the life of the Great Emancipator, "Abraham Lincoln," now showing at the Rex theater is a production which cannot be excelled. As a pictorialization of the numerous incidents and great moments in Lincoln's life the play is invaluable as a concise and accurate brief of the life of the man so beloved by the American public. "Abraham Lincoln," is a picture no one in Eugene should fail to see.

The play has no exciting, fictionalized movie plot but takes up in narrative form the events in Lincoln's life from the time he was born until he was assassinated.

George Billings taking the part of Lincoln does a marvelous impersonation and his resemblance to the martyred president is striking. The entire cast of characters is excellent. Great figures like General Grant, Stephen Douglas, General Lee, Ell Sheridan, and Secretary Seward are instantly recognized and agree exactly with the pictures and accounts we have of these men.

The picture begins by showing the familiar cabin where Lincoln was born. Then we see the boy going over the few books he could obtain and writing his figures and letters on a shovel before the light of the fireplace. Then we see the tall, lanky, awkward young man freighting down the river to the south where he gains insight to the cruelties of slavery and makes a resolve to better the conditions if he could. Then come the scenes in New Salem, Indiana, where Lincoln is the honest groceryman and postmaster, and where he meets Anne Rutledge. Then we see him studying and practicing his law in Springfield, Illinois. Here comes the defeat for the legislature and his final victory over Douglas for the senate.

Throughout the story there are the numerous incidents which portray the dry humor so characteristic of Lincoln, and other incidents to show his great love and mercy for animals. There is the deal with the horse trader; the predicament Lincoln finds himself in as the captain of a small army in the Indian war and he doesn't know the tactics to order his men about and the humorous way in which he gets around it; and the interesting scenes when Douglas comes to the famous debate surrounded in all manner of pomp and ceremony while Lincoln riding alone to the place on his lone steed to aid a squalling pig get from under a fence and out of the mud.

It is in the scenes at the White House where he takes up his presidential duties that we more vividly understand the great suffering and sacrifice through which Lincoln went as he endured the threats, insinuations, the appeals of hundreds of sufferers of the war, and his magnificent efforts to fulfill his great responsibility. We see him in his White House duties mastering the constraint with his cabinet, we see him visiting the hospitals, visiting the armies where he pardons the boy who fell asleep while on guard, we see him conferring and encouraging the people as the union suffers its first crushing defeat. Then there is the trip to Gettysburg where he delivers the immortal address and leaves the platform humiliated and disheartened, believing he has failed because the people, amazed and profoundly moved, forget to applaud immediately. Of course there are the famous battle scenes and the final celebration of peace which turned in so few days to grief.

The scene in the box where John Wilkes Booth fired the fatal shot is acted and worked out in a masterly way.

The prolog featuring Hugh Winder and his quartet in "Plantation Memories" is a beautiful thing, with elaborate settings, and a number of the old favorite southern melodies.
