

DEAN OF BARBERS IN CITY RECALLS EARLY DAYS HERE

"No, I am not planning to retire," declared Jerry Horn, dean of the barber trade in Eugene, this morning. "I am still at work, and expect to keep it up for a long, long time, although I may take a few days' vacation from time to time."

"Jerry" has been a barber all his life. He learned the trade in Eugene, and for more than 20 years operated his own shop at the present location of the Palace Barber shop on Wilamette street. Barbers' unions were a thing unheard of when he first started work, and the only reason he left his chair last week at the Palace shop where he has been working, was because the union asked him to pay for "the privilege of continuing to work at a trade at which I have worked here 12 years."

"Please understand that I have no fight with the union," he explained. "It may be a great thing for young barbers, but to a man who has been at it as long as I have, it is an unnecessary luxury."

Early Days Recalled.

The veteran barber recalls Eugene when the business section of the city was Wilamette street from Seventh to Ninth. He owned his own shop when there was only one other shop in town. Now there are more than 25.

"Eugene has grown more in the last two years than in any other period that I recall," he says. "There have been more new buildings erected, more people locating here, and more industries started, than ever before. I can remember a time when for years the town virtually stood still. When a man built a new house the papers carried big headlines about it. Now we have already exceeded a million dollars in building already this year, and think nothing of it."

Bobbing hair has only come into practice in barber shops the last few years, he states. Up until that time the nearest women ever came to barber shops was to bring their youngsters in to have their hair cut for the first time.

"Bobbing" Is Trade.

"Bobbing hair is almost a trade in itself now," he said. "The most know how to cut women's hair precisely the way they want it, and no two want it exactly alike. With men's hair it is different. You usually can tell just how a man's hair will look after it is cut and combed, but bobbed hair must be cut to look right in the style in which the woman wears it."

Bobbed hair has come to stay, he believes, and many arrangements for their women customers, either by a beauty parlor in connection, or a private room, where work is done by appointment.

Although he admits 66 years, "Jerry" says a man is only as old as he feels. He is still able to hold his own in a day's work with any of the younger generation, and though he is in a position to retire if he wishes, he insists that such a thing is farthest from his mind. He may enter business again for himself, if the opportunity looks good.

At present Mr. Horn is employed at the O. K. barber shop, on Ninth avenue west, just off Wilamette street.

The invitation was extended to President P. L. Campbell, who is too ill to attend, and Professor Handman was selected to act in his place.
