

FALMAN ON STAND AGAINST SHEPHERD

He stumbled through his testimony and for the most part kept his eyes closed at his feet.

"Will the witness please talk loud," the defendant can't hear a word," interrupted Robert Stoll, Shepherd's law partner, who through out the trial has been by Shepherd's side.

The jurors strained forward in their seats, those farthest away cupping their ears in an effort to hear.

No Questions Asked
No questions were asked Falman as he was given free rein to go on through his story.

Prosecutor Crowe, seated directly in front of Falman urged the witness to "keep your voice up, we can't hear you."

It was on his third visit to the Falman school that Shepherd introduced the name of Billy McClintock.

"I told him I could not take charge on something irregular about my place there as I had spent a lot of money on it. If there was anything irregular I should be well paid for it."

The next testimony dealt with Billy's sickness.

Falman, in testimony that Shepherd had obtained germs from Falman's school said that in response to Shepherd's questions, he told him he had three tubes of typhoid cultures.

Shepherd said he would like some typhoid cultures Falman continued and was told he could have them, as Falman could obtain more at the health department laboratory.

Shepherd then expressed a desire to learn about a course in bacteriology, according to Falman, but said he was too busy at that time to take it.

Criminal phases of bacteriology were gone into, Shepherd asking Falman if he had known of any cases in which bacteria were used as criminal means.

Shepherd and Falman talked of tuberculosis germs, Falman testified and Falman told the defendant that such germs could be carried for life without the person being noticeably affected.

How bacteria entered the body, in food, water and respiration were explained to Shepherd at his request.

Falman testified in response to Shepherd's questioning he said he explained how typhoid could be detected. This, he said, was difficult in its early stages. Diphtheria bacilli were also discussed. Negotiations with Shepherd extended over several months, Falman asserted. He said he told Shepherd how to keep cultures alive.

Mentions Billy
Shepherd said he had an adopted son, Billy, worth one or two million dollars, continued Falman, and that he had arranged Billy's will and could do practically as he wished with it.

He asked him if Billy ran around much, Falman testified.

"He told me that he did not, and he was engaged to Miss Pope, and I asked him if he knew when they were going to get married, and he said he expected they would get married at any time, and I told him that would leave him out in the cold on the will proposition."

He said that he didn't know exactly how that would affect him, but he didn't think it would be favorable, and I told him that he ought to make some arrangements of kind to take care of himself after the boy leaves, after he becomes of age and is married, and he told me that he had his mind on something and he could figure things out all right for himself."

Shepherd said he was too busy at that time to go into work at Falman's school, Falman continued.

on all the national forests, it is shown.

A marked increase over the previous year's estimates is accounted for by the fact that last year was a dry year in the west, and that the dry conditions resulted in an unusual concentration of game animals around watering places, which enabled rangers to make closer estimates than in former years. Only animals using national forest ranges are included in the estimates.

Figures for national forests in Oregon alone are 6000 bear, 60,000 deer of all kinds, 3000 elk, 30 mountain sheep and 30 antelope.

In the Cascade forest, according to trappers in the upper Willamette section, wolves are increasing rapidly. Deer are also believed to be increasing, despite the annual onslaught of sportsmen on buck deer. Game birds such as mountain quail, pheasants, etc., are also propagating rapidly.

northern end of the North American continent from east to west, reaching King William's land where she remained frozen in for two years.

Coast is Charted.
During this period Amundsen organized a sledging expedition to the magnetic north pole, which accomplished its purpose and charted the coast of Victoria land.

It was in 1915, with the south pole and the magnetic north pole discoveries already to his credit, that Amundsen began to make plans for another expedition which would take him to the true north pole and thus give him the distinction of being the only man.

Machines Obtained

Amundsen's efforts to this end did not bear fruit for some time, owing to difficulties with his airplane equipment, but this year he brought his efforts to a focus, obtained the two machines with which he made his flight, had them transported to Spitzbergen and after several weeks of preliminary work made his memorable jump off from King's Bay on May 21.

It was the cooperation of Lincoln Ellsworth and the latter's father, James Ellsworth, one of America's leading coal operators that made Amundsen's trip this year a possibility. The Ellsworth's came forward with financial aid which made it possible for the Norwegian explorer to perfect his plans. The contribution of the elder Ellsworth was understood to have been $85,000, or about two thirds of the cost of the expedition. Norwegians made up the other third, the government of Norway giving $10,000.

Elder Ellsworth Dies
The younger Ellsworth comes back from the expedition to hear the sad news that his father had passed away since the son's departure. The elder Ellsworth died in Florence, Italy, June 3. Nearly a fortnight had passed since the expedition flew away from Spitzbergen and the period had been one of extreme anxiety for the father. Dispatches from Florence said it was believed this had much to do with his demise.

As the days and weeks passed following the departure of the Amundsen expedition from Spitzbergen and no word was received of the party the feeling grew among men familiar with Arctic conditions that Amundsen's return to Spitzbergen was extremely unlikely. While confidence was expressed in exploration circles that the Norwegian and his companions would ultimately emerge safely, it was generally thought the airplanes had been either damaged or destroyed and that they probably would have to make their way out of the Arctic over the ice, probably to Cape Columbia, about 500 miles from the pole. The expedition had an emergency outfit, complete with the most minute details, for a return by land, including a detailed map of the proposed route to Cape Columbia, and thence southward with all the food and fuel stations marked.
