

FARMERS WARNED BY STATE COLLEGE

Farmers who buy gilts at prices far above even pure-bred figures from a swine company now reported operating in Oregon with the promise of selling back all female progeny at a high price are doomed to eventual disappointment at loss, warns E. L. Potter, head of the animal husbandry department at the state college who has investigated the scheme here and elsewhere.

In spite of all the contracts in the world, says Potter, the company cannot afford to buy back the gilts at premium prices any longer than they can resell them at still higher prices to other farmers. Thus the business must grow in a geometric ratio making it only a question of time until the company refuses further purchases.

This, in fact, is exactly what happened with a similar scheme used in Kansas some three years ago, Professor Potter finds. After the expansion had reached its limit the manager of the company wrote a polite letter telling his customers that "it is impossible to move the gilts that we had planned." A statement altogether true, says Potter.

"Such a company attempted to start operations here three years ago but was discouraged when the college threatened to expose the scheme," Professor Potter explained. "Exchanging cash for promises is always dangerous, but especially so when these promises, in their very nature, must eventually be impossible to fulfill."
