

THE NEW PIRATE HAT HAS COLORFUL APPEAL

Proby Gish Adds a New Outline to the Season's Established Mode by Introducing a Hat of Original Lines—Chic of Small Hat Is Varied

As the head had become accustomed to the feeling of snugness and warmth of the enduring felt, Paris decreed that she should be a diva's ally and introduce the new fall and winter hat.
Proby Gish, who is appearing in a feature film, has introduced a hat of original lines and great appeal. Leon Errol, who is seen in the film, designed the hat especially for Miss Gish. Black felt, cut along established pirate lines, with the skull and crossbones, succeeded by two pins crossed in like manner, add a note of dash and color to the hat.
Felt, of course, are still very much in the mode. In charming shades and shapes that are made to accompany almost every frock in the elaborate wardrobe. The outlines of these trim little hats, however, have been softened until they meet with the requirements of the new mode. The severity of the all plain and tailored hat of last year has been succeeded by a hat of smartness which creates a slightly softer line and casual elegance, yet maintains an air of simplicity.
The velvet, which is so very becoming, is softer in feeling than the felt and is exquisite in the fall the always popular beige and black are in vogue and highly becoming in velvet. The velvet hat, with its smartly upturned brim, its winged effect at one side, its cut back and drooping side, is very chic for the afternoon ensemble. The grosgrain trimming is most effective on this type of hat—when any trimming is used at all.
The four materials used with the greatest resulting popularity are velvet, felt, grosgrain and satin. The invasion of velvets into the field of smart hats has continued with unabating success. The velvet toque and turban have best adapted to the velvet hat, while occasionally the larger hat finds this fabric best suited.
Satin and grosgrain ribbons are skillfully combined in some of the smaller hats. Cascades of the ribbon falling at one side creates an interesting outline.
The large hat, which persists in its popularity, is often intricate in its outline. There will be a skillful fold here and there to add to its smartness, and the trimming is always of an unusual nature.
Feathers have come to the fore in trimming the latest hats. They are never used in simple trimmings, but are placed in odd lines to create a chic effect. The matching feather and velvet hat—in the very small model—is a very becoming and accompanying the formal daytime ensemble perfectly.
The draped turban continues the most appealing head covering for the evening. Just now the simple draped outline has been enlarged upon and there is frequently seen a clasp like front in jeweled pattern which adds a note of importance to the costume.
Large bows at one side lend a definite note of chic. But they are hard to duplicate when copied from the famous Paris imports. The bow, to be at all effective, has to give a very chic outline.
Fur is used on some hats, but is used carefully. The tails frequently are seen as an effective form of trimming on the small hat.
Cascading feathers are a feature of the afternoon hat. The hat is usually of velvet in very intricate cut and features a cascading movement of ostrich feathers over part of the crown and well down over the shoulder. Feathers, when skillfully applied, add a note of smartness to the formal attire that is difficult to duplicate.

SIMPLICITY IN STREET ENSEMBLE

Chic Is Established by the Accompanying Accessories as Well as the New Silhouette is also new. There is the bustle most elaborate of seasons, and furs will lend an important role in creating a rich and chic appearance.

As the season advances, there is noticed a continued popularity for the two piece afternoon frock. The separate blouse arrangement lends itself admirably to the vogue for velvets and soft woolsens. The combination of crepe silks and velvets, or Jersey and velvets, too, form a popular method of bringing smartness to the costume.
The smart frock worn beneath the coat stresses the importance of youth and good taste. There should be a complete harmony in all the little things which create a stunning ensemble. The frock should match the coat in feeling, and the gloves, fur scarf, pocket-book and handkerchief all should be in complete accord.
The hat which accompanies the afternoon ensemble frequently attracts an important note to the picture. It is necessary that the hat harmonizes in line, material and size.
Joyce Compton, in her new picture, has selected a smart afternoon ensemble which combines good taste and chic. The black fox scarf that Miss Compton wears adds a pleasing note to the costume. Miss Compton has selected a type of gown that is particularly well suited to her petite beauty, and consequently appears smartly groomed.

Not Too Much Cereal Is Doctor's Advice

Public health nurses hold classes for midwives and prospective mothers.
They visit the schools and give physical examinations to the young children, and talk on hygiene, instructing the teacher in giving lessons in healthful living or in preparing exhibits or health plays.
They give health talks to the public and perform all sorts of health educational work.
They follow up clinic and school cases.
They have a special care for the needs of maternal and infant hygiene and often hold classes or give "hours" to this line of work. They are generally available at stated times and may be consulted by mothers who bring their babies with them.
It has been demonstrated that a public health nurse is an economy, saving dollars and cents in the price of ill health.

Sangha Flour for Southern Millinery

Fifth Avenue is stressing the importance of the Sangha straw bodices, the crocheted straw sponsored by Rebox, for Southern millinery. One in green exploits the present-favored high-back draped crown. The trim consisted mostly of velvet ribbon to match. One had a band and cascade of novelty silk ribbon whills on another model in a delicate mauve shade there was posed at the aide a cluster of mauve feather tulips.—Dry Goods Economist.

Silk or Rayon Damask for Bathing Suits

One of the newest materials for the development of bathing apparel is silk or rayon damask, says the Dry Goods Economist.

This fabric is very decorative and is used for both suits and beach wraps. Solid colored crepe de chine make exceptionally smart suits and depend upon the intricacy of their cut and styling to make them distinctive. Tubular silks are also being made into suits, the silk forming a slip hung over knitted worsted tights.
Two-in-one bathing suits are occasionally made of heavy glove silk.

Prospects are Bright for Checkered Fabrics

Fifth Avenue sponsors checks for southern resort wear, and it is also thought that there is every prospect for a favorite spring season for checkered fabrics, says the Dry Goods Economist. Two-piece frocks are shown in a fabric checked in alternate squares of red, blue and white. Checks are also sponsored for coats, but very often take on larger patterns for coats of strictly sports type. Very youthful two-piece frocks are frequently noted with pleated checked woolen skirts accompanied by blouses of plain wool or velvet.

CHILD'S ENVIRONMENT COUNTS

With the Growing Boys and Girls Heredity Is Fixed, But the Environment Can Often Be Improved

The question, which is the more important, heredity or environment, has provoked endless discussion. "He's just like his father, and you can't do a thing with him" account to some people, frequently the mother's people, for all the bad traits a child may show. Others are sure that, no matter what his parents may have been, every child starts fresh and the conditions which surround him determine absolutely what he will be. Everyone knows that children from degraded homes who have been adopted by well-to-do families and have been given every advantage have turned out, some disgracefully and some so as to make worth while everything that has been done for them. What made the difference in results? Heredity? Perhaps. As the proverb has it, "You can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear." Environment? Perhaps, also, some children who were surrounded by bad conditions during their early years were already started in unfortunate habits before they were transplanted. Moreover, the new conditions, supposedly better, may have been better in lodging, food and clothing only. The child may have been brought up, in fact, by a feeble-minded nurse and the friends she met in the park, or may have led a lonely life starved of affection and been seen by his foster mother only when her social encumbrances permitted to play with the child for a little while as she might with a doll.
After all it is useless to attempt to settle whether heredity or environment is the more important. Every living being is affected by both. The practical question is what may be done to control both so as to secure the best results. Whether we are trying to produce good corn, good pigs, or good people.
With growing boys and girls heredity is fixed, but the environment can often be improved. The parents are the ones who control the destiny of the child and make his environment to a large extent. Their mental ability, their control of their emotions, their interests, particularly their interest in the child, their ambitions or lack of them, their moral standards—these all determine what the child shall make out of the endowment that nature has given him. Some parents who read to their children or tell them stories and answer their questions in an interesting and intelligent manner, though they do not alter the children's intellectual equipment, do furnish a rich soil in which the children may develop, and thus affect very much the point which their development may reach. Parents can even determine what kind of atmosphere the child's mind shall grow in—one of discontent, wrangling, deceit, and hate, or one of cheerfulness, sincerity, and love.
