GRAZING REPORT MADE

NUMBER OF CATTLE IN FOR- EST DIMINISHING

Sheep May Be Brought Over from Central Oregon by Rain When New Line Is Finished

The number of cattle grazed on the Cascade national forest has diminished from year to year dur- ing the past few years, according to a report on grazing for 1925, issued yesterday by Nelson F. Mac- duff, supervisor of the forest.

Nine permits were issued dur- ing the year for cattle and 322 head were grazed. The fees amounted to 56 cents a head for a period of four or five months.

Thirteen sheep permits were is- sued and 19,600 head were grazed, says the report. Only about three- fifths of the range was used dur- ing the year owing to the inacces- sibility of much of it. The forest supervisor said that with the com- pletion of the Southern Pacific company's Natron cutoff over the mountains, sheep raisers of cen- tral Oregon may be induced to ship their flocks to the western side of the mountains each sum- mer for grazing.

The report states where sheep have grazed in the mountains and where they have been properly handled the fire hazards have been appreciably diminished.

C. H. McFarland, ranger, and Dee Wright, forest employe, have been experimenting with a galvan- ized iron watering trough on Chuckaney mountain which is lo- cated between the south fork of the McKenzie, Big Fall creek and the north fork of the Willamette. There is but one spring on the mountain and previous to this time the cattle have trampled it, making it muddy and difficult for them to drink from it. The spring has been fenced up and the water piped to this trough. If it with- stands the snows and hard weather of the winter it will become a per- manent fixture on that mountain, said Supervisor Macduff.
