Growing Xmas Trees Coming Business

Christmas tree crops, raised on plant especially set aside for the growing of evergreens, seems to be a coming business, say forestry officials of the United States department of agriculture. Although federal foresters do not feel that the use of Christmas trees is either a menace to the country's timber supply or incompatible with forest conservation, they point out that the practice of growing small evergreens especially for the Christmas trade is far better than cutting them in an indiscriminate manner.

In 1924 spruce and fir trees commonly sold for $1 to $2 and more on the streets of the larger eastern cities. Retail prices have increased several hundred per cent in the last 10 or 20 years and high prices are likely to prevail in the future. Growing Christmas trees in plantations near large consuming centers is beginning to look like an attractive business. This is particularly true for centers in the eastern and middle western states, which are rather distant from the natural sources of supply. Several such plantations are already in existence from which trees have been sold at prices ranging from 50 cents to $1.50 each. In a plantation adjacent to a main road it seems probable that the trees could be sold right on the ground to people passing in automobiles.

Spruce and fir, where they can be grown, are the logical choice for planting, because they are the most desired as Christmas trees and command the highest prices. Since the trees will be grown only for from five to eight years after they are set out, they can be planted at the rate of 5000 to the acre. It is doubtful says the department, whether Christmas tree plantations would at present yield satisfactory financial returns in the south and the far west because of the abundant supply of small evergreens found in the forests of those localities.
