WEST BEHIND IN MUSIC

SAYS ORCHESTRA LEADER

William Von Hoogstraten Speaks in Eugene

DEVELOPMENT IS TRACED

Problems Confronting Symphony Director Described by Portland Musician

"Everything outside, so to speak, I find marvelous here," said William Von Hoogstraten, new director of the Portland symphony orchestra, who spoke to the music lovers at the university Friday afternoon.

"But there may be a lack of intimacy of feeling at the heart of things; I do not say religion because that is associated with churches, and I do not mean that. One needs to get away from life and life's troubles before he can do great composing. Great composing can only be done by great men."

After a few introductory remarks from John J. Landsbury, dean of the school of music, Mr. Von Hoogstraten was presented by Mrs. Donald Spencer, who has been one of the guiding spirits of the Portland symphony orchestra for many years.

"I should first like to speak briefly of the development of music of the world, then of the problems of bringing music to the West," said Mr. Von Hoogstraten.

"Back and the older music masters wrote music for the love of it, setting forth no problem or story, but creating music for itself, by divine inspiration, if you choose," the speaker said.

"It seems to me that during the romantic period after Beethoven, say from 1820 to 1860, the element of personality came into music, the element of personal expression as found in poetry. I wonder what Bach would have said if asked to write a musical composition expressive of death and the transfiguration."

Strauss wrote symphonic poems. During the time of Strauss and through his influence music became more philosophical and religious. Mr. Von Hoogstraten continued. Some of the music of Strauss were pure symphonic poems. Now, in his opinion, we are coming to a new era, or perhaps to a reversion to one of the earlier forms of music.

"We are going back to absolute music," the Portland musician continued, "but in a way that is absolutely different from the earlier period. We are at the moment at a very difficult point in musical development; we are undertaking music under no form, no laws, with no poem, nothing to describe it."

In speaking of the problem confronting him as the director of the Portland symphony orchestra, the only symphony orchestra in the West, Mr. Von Hoogstraten said: "Where is music in the Northwest? Nowhere, orchestra speaking. Where shall I begin in the Portland symphony orchestra? I would be glad indeed to have that question answered."

"I have found that the things people in the Northwest like best is emotional music," said Mr. Von Hoogstraten. "I believe that the people of the Northwest are especially fond of the music of Strauss."

This is true also in New York. On the contrary, if one were to put on Tschakowsky numbers in a program in Paris the audience would not come. I do not know how much farther they are than we, but they have passed their Tschakowsky stage.

"But now here in the West what am I going to do?" the speaker inquired. "Am I going to feed you more Tschakowsky or shall we Brahms? I cannot take 57 years to go through the whole development of music gradually? At present I am planning very general, mixed programs."

Lack of musical education in the homes was deplored by Mr. Von Hoogstraten. People in the West like music and come readily to hear it, he says, but he believes that not more than 10 percent of his Portland audiences have any knowledge or deep understanding of the pieces they hear. This is due to lack of opportunities for music study, especially as concerns the orchestra. Art and literature are comparatively easy to transplant, but appreciation and understanding of orchestral art cannot be developed until there is a local orchestra.

There is a rumor that Eugene and Salem men have chosen a site just south of the new garage location and plan to erect a four-story hotel during the coming summer.

A local painter reports that he has nine large painting jobs slated and assurance of a full season's work. The coming of the bridge is of course adding to the town's prosperity.

FEW QUERIES ANSWERED

HARRISBURG CHAMBER TAKES UP DAIRY PROBLEM

Better Market for Products Aim of Survey Being Conducted Among Farmers

HARRISBURG, Ore., March 6.—(Special to the Register.)—The chamber of commerce is experiencing a disappointment in not receiving many answers in response to a questionnaire sent out about a week ago to farmers of the vicinity asking for information on the dairy situation. The chamber desires to assist in re-establishing the cheese factory here which has suspended. Out of 250 questionnaires sent out only a score of answers have been received.

A dozen or more creameries are receiving shipments of cream from this place, each dairyman apparently acting independently. As a result the dairy end of farming in this vicinity is not in a vigorous condition, and some of the heaviest investors in dairy cows and dairy equipment are openly admitting that they are ready to sell their cows and return to the old rut of straight grain farming.

The chamber is taking its action in hopes of reviving the dairy interest, believing that the dairyman fares best as a general rule, and also that their product delivered to a cheese factory will bring larger returns than when the cream alone is sold.
