EXERCISE FOR ADULTS

GEORGE J. FISHER, M. D.

THE history of man is that he has always been accustomed to vigorous bodily exercise. Consequently his muscles are numerous and large. About half the body weight is made up by the muscles. Thus they constitute a large part of his being. Furthermore, in his development the muscles came first. Heart, lungs, liver, nervous system, all came later. They came as a result of muscle contraction. When muscles were used in a greater variety of ways then there was need for richer blood, more elaborate digestion, and a nervous system to control them. Half the brain in fact is given over to the care of the muscles. Thus we see that muscles are exceedingly important organs. They are related to all the organs of the body. They are most closely connected with the nerves of the body and are very directly related to the brain. Well-toned, active muscles mean a good heart, strong lungs, good digestion, fine circulation, nervous control, and mental vigor. When the muscles get flabby and lose their tone the blood gets sluggish, the lungs lazy, the nerves jumpy, and the brain dull. You cannot neglect the muscles without feeling the results at many important points.

Now unfortunately most of our work today does not make sufficient demand upon our muscles. A great deal of it is done sitting still or standing still, and we were never made to sit still or stand still. We were made to be physically active. Most of the big muscles are quite closely related to the legs. We should concern ourselves with leg activity. Walking, slow running, leg bending, and body bending, and twisting from the hips are necessary. Note how quickly rapid walking or body bending affects our breathing, the heart rate, and if more prolonged, the digestion. Most of our ailments such as indigestion, short wind, dullness of the head, are due to muscle inactivity. Provide the activity and these will disappear. A brisk walk several times a day, indulgence in some favorite physical game once or twice a week, some muscle calisthenics in morning and evening, a daily sponge bath with a brisk rub will put most of us in excellent condition if practiced regularly. On the other hand to neglect this practice may result in a tendency toward sluggishness, occasional bilious attacks, chronic colds, increase of weight so characteristic now of mid-life, and shallow breathing.
