Oregon Woman Fights Typhoid. Saves 1000 Children and Runs Special Trains.

"My life has been so hum-drum and as nothing has happened to me out of the ordinary I am sure there is nothing in what I have done the last two years in the Near East that would be of interest to my Oregon friends," stated Mrs. Amy Anthony Burt of Bend, Oregon, to J. J. Handsaker, State Director of the Near East Relief when he met her in Constantinople last summer.

"After much effort," says Mr. Handsaker, "I persuaded her to tell me some of the things of this hum-drum life of hers. Sitting in a Constantinople coffee-house she told me of some of the events of her life since March 1919, when she arrived in the Near East."
"Her first work was at Karaklis, where with her sister, Miss Gertrude Anthony, she had charge of a large orphanage and a territory 75 miles square for general relief. During the time she was there she nursed her sister through both typhoid and typhus. The two women were alone in this station.

"After going through this experience they went to Alexandropol and there one day received a message from the English that they were evacuating Baku, some 500 miles away. The British had been feeding about 1,000 children, and unless they were transferred immediately they would starve as soon as the British left. This Oregon woman whose life was so hum-drum quietly secured two special trains, putting a man in charge of one, and taking the other herself. On arriving at Baku, she began loading the children at 10 o'clock a. m. and had the children and their supplies all aboard by 8:30 p. m. She read the riot act to the Turkish captain in charge of the train and he compelled the guards to cease attempting to enter the cars where the older girls and women were. The round trip took nearly two weeks, but Mrs. Burt returned to Alexandropol with her two train loads of children without having lost a single child.

"We simply must ignore the rest," she writes. "Just outside our gates there are scores of starving children lying or sitting about listlessly, shivering in filthy rags, with their little bones fairly protruding through their skins. Many of them are sick and in pain, and they all beg piteously to be taken in every time they can catch the attention of any of the workers. Many times we have taken in just one more until it cannot be done again, else there would not be food enough for the ones we already have. Another awful thing one may see any day, are the little quiet bundles of rags lying on the sunny side of a wall or a hill side, just able to stir feebly now and then, or to lift up pleading little wistful arms in supplication, if anyone passes. They will lie in the same spot for days sometimes, before they become quite still. Then the Soviet cart with its daily load of the dead, comes and picks up the little bundle. Just picture any one of the many mothers in this tragic land—half-starved and despairing, clad in rags and tatters with her naked babe in her arms, the little thing trying feebly to draw nourishment from her dried-up breasts. I must not write of it, nor think of it. We must all keep strong for the work that is before us, and think only of the great good that we are doing. But I beg of you, never believe that there can be any exaggeration in the stories you hear of the sufferings and horrors here in this unhappy land
