I Wonder

I wonder how many readers of this paper ever paused for a few moments in their pursuit of life and happiness to consider why they should be interested in the protection and preservation of the Forests. Of the Forests right here at your back door. Don't say you aren't interested, because you are and you can't help it. You go there in the hot days of summer to enjoy the cool air and get a good drink of water. You go there to fish and hunt and pick berries, and you go there for your wood and lumber. And the time is not far distant when you are going there to sell your produce.

There is approximately four hundred and thirty five million feet of pine between White River and the north boundary of the Warm Spring Indian Reservation. There is approximately two billion one hundred seventy five million feet of pine and a larger amount of fir which is going to market in the not very distant future through the White river and Wapinitia creek gateways. It will require many years of time to move this timber, and while it is moving another crop will be growing. An this harvest is going to consume just about everything you produce. You are interested in preventing its destruction by fire because of the revenue it will pay into the county treasury as well as for what you are going to get out of it for labor or produce. Twenty five per cent of the gross receipts from timber sales on each National Forest goes to the counties in which the forest lies divided on a basis of acreage of National Forest land in each county.

From this source Wasco county received $2916.39 in 1923 and has received since 1906 the sum of $11529.84

PROPAGANDA

Before the war, the term "propaganda" was a dignified polysyllabic used only by academic newspaper editors and silver-tongued demagogues. During the war, it gained a new significance in the mind of the public. It became something sinister, insidious, a device of the devil for the purpose of leading the snidish public astray.

Yet the definition of "propaganda" is simple enough: "Any plan or method of spreading an opinion or belief." It is, in other words, as old as human speech. Since the beginning of time man has impressed his opinions and beliefs upon his neighbors. Propaganda tinges every expression we make. It cannot be avoided. Man is a gregarious animal—dependent upon his neighbor throughout our entire social structure. And, he is dependent on his neighbor's opinion.

Let us take an example right here in Oregon. Smith, the farmer, goes to town to do a little shopping. He has several calls to make—at the grocery store, the hardware store, and the garage, let us say. Smith enters the grocery store, Jones, the proprietor, greets him and fakes his order. As he is wrapping up the parcels, Jones says: "I feel sorry for you farmers this year. You're not getting a square deal. The agricultural situation looks pretty bad." Smith agrees, takes his parcels and departs. At the hardware store, the proprietor says: "How is every thing, Smith? I suppose you're broke like all the rest of the boys?" Smith admits that he isn't as prosperous as he has been, and proceeds to the garage. "My business ain't what it used to be," complains the garage man. "Everybody's down and out." Smith gloomily agrees.

On the way home, Smith is despondent. Although he does not realize it, propaganda has done its dirty work. His ambition and energy are impaired. He is discouraged, and draws a questionable comfort from the belief that all the farmers of the country are in a bad way.

Now, suppose the grocery merchant, in talking to Smith advances something like this: "Well you're certainly looking fine, Smith! You're another one of these boys with the big crops this year, huh? You farmers are coming back strong, no question about it!" Smith doubtfully agrees. But when the hardware man says: "Pretty nice the way you fellows are getting top prices for wool now—figured out your income tax yet?" Smith laughs, and feels better. And when the garage man says: "Sloan, down on the old Taylor place, is buying a new car this spring. Do you know how much his twenty cows are making him each month? Two hundred and forty dollars! He's making more than I am." Smith decides that the farmers aren't so badly off after all. If other farmers are doing so well, he can do as well, too. Come to think of it, he is getting along all right; he really hasn't much to complain about.

As he rides home he notices with satisfaction how broad and smooth the highway is. It is early spring, and wide fields and orchards and evergreen groves stretch afar to the distant hills. A prosperous land; a productive land. He settles himself comfortably in his seat and begins to lay his plans for the spring; bigger and more optimistic plans. He does not know what has happened to him. He does not know that propaganda has stretched forth a kindly hand to him. He only knows that he feels better.

All of which leads us to the question: What kind of propaganda are you spreading?—Oregon Business.
