Pit Silos Recommended

Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis, --(Special.)

The pit silo, one of the earliest forms of silos, is coming into use again. The pit was dug in the ground and the green crop thrown in and covered with earth to exclude the air and allow normal silage fermentation to take place.

The new trench silo, developed at the Experiment station at Brandon, Canada, is a trench 30 feet long, 12 feet wide, and 7 feet deep. It was left sloping at one end so a team and wagon could be backed into it for hauling out the feed. It contained 45 tons of corn silage when rounded up. In 1922, wet straw was put on to protect the top. In 1923, dry straw was used. No more silage was lost in either year than in the usual above ground silo.

Even in that cold, dry, climate the silage came out in perfect condition, while the heat was retained better than in the above ground silo. No trouble was experienced with frozen silage.

The trench silo may find place in eastern and southern Oregon where there is no water table near the surface of the soil. The silo may be 12 to 18 feet wide, 7 to 10 feet deep, and of any length desired. If extra long, it will be necessary to fill at several places. There is a choice between one long or several short silos.

The size of the silo should be adapted to the size of the herd so as to feed off the face of the entire open end of the silo each day. It is desirable that the walls be as straight as possible to allow for adequate settling. There is a tendency for the walls of trench silos to cave in after the removal of the silage. This is especially true in loose soils where there is much freezing and thawing. Many of these pit silos are being walled up with lumber and concrete.

The trench silo requires little work but the digging. Sometimes a roof is built over the silo to protect it, but it should be high enough to allow workmen and horses on top of the silage. In filling, if the silage is dry, water may be added near the walls. The forage is cut in and tramped with a horse, because of the shallowness of the silo.

Peas, oats, or corn are particularly recommended as filling for the trench silo.

When the night train which passes through here at 2 or three o'clock in the morning awakes all the town cocks and they commence their enthusiastic concert accompanied occasionally by the purr of an automobile driven by some belated motorist or an early riser, one feels like operating on all the roosters one rnd one-half inches below the base of the comb with a pair of pruning shears and then departing for some shady nook in the heart of the forest where peaceful rest may be obtained free from trains, automobiles and roosters. Help prevent forest fires, for when our forests are gone we may find no such restful nook.

The problem of the deep fill in front of the Creager property has caused considerably discussion this week, since it is becoming evident to all that the fill is actually to be made. It conceded by the highway officials however that the fill is necessary and work will continue as the survey demands. The stem shovel made the trip up Dechutes avenue Monday morning and work on the cut and, fill at the west end and is progressing rapidly.

We have not yet satisfied our curiosity why the construction company on the local branch of the highway haul water from across the river to the steam shovel now working at a point 200 feet from the source of the Maupin springs. Do the six sturdy mules necessarily have to have the exercise these warm days to keep reduced in flesh and maintain their appetites and keep in the habit of working? Is the water better over there or does it need the warming process undergone during the trip through town? Could not a hose from one of the nearby residence outside facets fill the tank as quickly and save the uphill trip from across the river? Or would the driver of the water wagon be out of a job if a shorter course were taken to supply the needed water for the steam shovel?
