Dangerous To Set Fires In Our Forests

It is becoming a serious matter to break the forest fire laws of Oregon and Washington. One hundred and eighty-five people found this out last summer when they left fire in the woods, were brought to justice by officers of the United States Forest service, and were found guilty.

It cost them $2,777 in fines and $518.95 in court costs.

Practically all of these cases were tried under the state fire laws by local justices of the peace, the large majority of whom, the federal forest officers report, are enforcing the fire laws without fear or favor.

These figures are given in a report just issued by the district forester's office, Portland, Oregon. A total of 184 cases were prosecuted and only three found not guilty. Fourteen additional cases are still pending final action.

In addition to these criminal cases, settlements were secured in seventeen civil cases, in which damages were collected by the government to the amount of $8,238.60. A number of civil cases, are still pending.

In the criminal cases, the report shows that 98 convictions were for camp fires, 31 were for brush-burning fires, and 19 were for smokers fires. Five convictions were for camp fires without permit, and two for smok-
