OREGON INDUSTROGRAMS BY DAN C. FREEMAN, PORTLAND

Woolen Industry Treated in Letter From Manager Oregon Manufacturers Assn.

Oregon mills are adopting ultra-modern looms that will weave six and a half yards of cloth per hour. Older looms weave four and a half yards per hour.

Good prices for wool are in prospect for years ahead. The world markets are awaiting the new clip. Steady wages on a generally high level in this industry will continue in Oregon, (thus keeping up fairly high average purchasing power of wage earners in this industry.) Leading Northwest mills are discarding slower machinery and cutting down costs. They are generally producing steady volume of output of quality, successfully competing nationally. These are the high lights in the woolen manufacturing industry, reported by the Oregon Manufacturers association, and based upon the observations of E. C. Carter, one of veteran woolen mill men of the Pacific coast, after completing a trip to the style centers of the country and to the machinery manufacturers.

Here's somewhat of a paradox Oregon's mills are forging ahead, adopting aggressive policies, vigilantly following markets and styles while there are many idle woolen mills scattered over the country. The general impression is that the textile industry is in an unsatisfactory shape as it has ever been in twenty years. However, wage cuts locally have been avoided, the workers are highly efficient and, incidentally, Oregon business coffers are receiving millions of dollars for the products from one of its best basic industries. There are thirty items of Oregon woolen products distributed nationally, some of them inter-nationally.

"Doc" Wilkins of The Dalles, formerly with the Haller Bros., has taken a contract to build a two and one-half mile stretch of the Clear Lake to Eyik Creek section of the Wapinitia cut-off. He moved into camp on the project on Monday.

Produce white eggs, Mr. Poultryman, or you will not be able to reach a profitable market, according to the conclusions of the poultrymen's convention at Corvallis last week. Manger Dixon of the Co-operative Poultry Producers assured those in attendance that only a local market exists for colored or low grade eggs. The convention elected M. S. Shrook of Milwaukie president for the coming year, and F. L. Knowlton, Corvallis, secretary-treasurer.
