Name of the "Dogger Bank."

The Dogger Bank has long been carefully protected, because in the shallow waters that surround it there is the finest fishing that is to be found anywhere near the English coast. The wide stretch that shelves down to a depth of only 120 feet is the largest sand bank in the North sea, and in by gone times it was claimed by both Holland and Denmark. The name has nothing to do with the geological formation of which the sand bank is composed. "Dogger" is a sandy, iron impregnated stone that is well known to the geologist. But this bank took its name from the two masted fishing boat that has been used by Holland for several centuries in the herring and cod fishing in the North sea. The dogger is similar to the ketch, but adapted for fishing, especially in the shallow waters surrounding the Dogger Bank.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The heavy snow fall the first of the week, raised all kinds of troubles for the motor trucks, with the Maxwell of R. C. Deming necessitating a rotary plow to get it out of Garfield after being stuck for two days. The Denby truck of Allen & Co. also foundered near the Githen's place in Currinsville, being a day late with its load of lumber.

The Estacada Garage became a corporation this week, with J. W. Reed as president; M. E. Park, secretary and J. M. Melton, vice-president and treasurer.

"Temper" and "Humor."
The history of the words "temper" and "humor" is very curious. According to ancient physiology, the human body included four "humors" (liquids)—blood, phlegm, bile and black bile or melancholia. Their combination formed a man's "temperament"—and we speak of sanguine, phlegmatic and melancholy temperaments to this day. "Temper," the synonym of "temperament," has undergone the strange developments which we have noted, so that "losing your temper" and "being in a temper" mean the same thing. Excess of one humor over the rest led to oddities: whence a "humorous" man came to signify an eccentric person. And now "humorous" applies not to the odd person, but to the man who sees the oddity in him.—London Spectator.

Armenia's Royal Pretenders.
The last king of Armenia died in Paris in 1393, but his alleged descendants have frequently asserted their rights to the Armenian crown. The last well authenticated claimant, Guy de Lusignan, died in a Parisian cellar in 1795, but a considerable stir was created some forty years ago by the pretensions of an Armenian family named Khorian. Archbishop Khorian, the head of the family, gained many influential supporters in England and on the continent, but was unable to attain his modest desire that Cyprus should be made over to him as a first step toward the complete restoration of the Armenian Kingdom. One of his brothers married an English lady, who may be still living. Another wedded Victor Hugo's friend, Mile de Nosrois, who subsequently styled herself Princess Marie de Lusignan of Cyprus, Jerusalem, and Armenia.—London Globe.
