How To Take Care Of Milk

Contributed by O. M. Opstad,
Superintendent of Estacada
Cooperative Cheese Association

One of the problems now facing many of the dairymen in our community, no doubt is, how to take care of their milk, to be able to deliver it in the best possible condition at the cheese factory.

We all know that milk should be removed from the stable immediately after being drawn, for if it remains long it is likely to take up stable odors.

Strong flavored feeds, such as kale or turnips, if consumed by the cow shortly before milking will produce the same flavors in the milk. If fed a number of hours before milking, or, preferably immediately after milking, the flavors will probably be passed off by the cow. Filth and dirt will cause milk to become gassy.

Where milk is to be sold in bulk it should be cooled as soon as possible after being drawn.

There are several ways of cooling milk. The most common and cheapest, is to set the cans in a trough or barrel of cold water.

Better results are obtained by having a continuous flow of water. While cooling, the milk should be kept well stirred in order to cause more rapid cooling.

Milk is a poor conductor of heat, and unless stirred occasionally, that near the center of the can will stay warm for some time after that near the sides is cooled. There are a number of devices on the market for cooling milk. Most of them use running water which flows through the inside while the milk flows down over the outside surface. These contrivances produce rapid cooling, but use several times as much water as the volume of milk. In selecting a cooler of this type, do not forget to look for ease of cleaning.

Never mix warm and cold milk together if you want it to stay sweet. There is nothing that will cause milk to spoil or sour much quicker.

Remember that sour or off flavored milk cannot be accepted at the cheese factory. Each patron should strive to do his part as good cheese can only be made from good clean milk.
