posits and good soil, could not help but succeed—but co-operation, hard work and true loyalty on the part of the inhabitants is responsible for the more than $350,000 per month payroll, now forthcoming from the industries of that bay country alone.

Its lumber industries both logging and milling, are the equal of any in the wide world. Its shipbuilding plants are up to the maximum of productiveness. Its coal deposits have been worked for over sixty years and are bringing in their harvest of dollars. The lands once covered with the most magnificent of spruce, hemlock, cedar and fir forests are in many places now under cultivation, growing the best of farm products and supporting thousands of cattle, which in turn are adding their wealth through the cheese factories and creameries.

In the Coquille district the spirit of rural co-operation was the underlying principle of success, with that district supporting and profiting by the maintenance of eleven co-operative cheese factories. Investigation showed that these factories had experienced and weathered the tribulations that come to all rural co-operative industries, but they had won out and were reaping a just reward.

Bandon, Coquille, Powers and dozens of smaller towns and rural communities apparently had also learned their lesson in co-operation. Each was still plugging for itself, jealous of its neighbor, yet ever willing to join with its rivals for the greater development.

To use the expression or slogan of the Chamber of Commerce publicist—"Coos Bay, the last seaport of magnitude now being developed on the Pacific Coast" is experiencing and profiting by the industrial boom caused by war stimulation. It has suffered its share of war penalties, with many of its boats and vessels now in government service and its over-the-top quota of young men in the army and navy.

Two years ago the Southern Pacific Railway extended its line into this favored section and is today profiting by passenger and freight traffic and the district is benefited in turn.

As to its people—they are the kind one would expect to find in such an environment. The men are regular fellows, hard workers, hard fighters, genial and unselfish hosts and loyal to the Nation's work in every form. They never get tired of talking about their Coos Bay country and its people.

Their women, whom ye editor had the privilege of meeting in their homes, at the public receptions, dinners and elsewhere, were of the finest and just like home-folks. They are ardent war workers, with the wives of the mill worker and the owner working hand in hand. They assume their full share of the community, charitable and civic activities and incidentally wear a smile that matches their complexions, the latter being the real article peculiar to that moist, fog and sunshine atmosphere.

The loyalty and boosting of the Coos Bay people is not confined to their country and industries, as exemplified in the state and nation wide introduction and campaign given their neighbor and fellow townsman, L. J. Simpson, who although defeated for the Republican candidacy for the governorship at the late primaries, is far from a defeated man.

"Louis", or "L. J." as they all call him, is a big man in all ways. He is a genuine he-man and his wealth proves no barrier in social or business relations. He has money, but he has easily overcome that handicap, for he is making more and more and making it at home, investing in home industries and spending it in home development.

While "L. J." is the big man of that community, he is in fast company, fast in the sense of being surrounded by hustling, energetic and ambitious men and men who all work together.

Mr. Simpson and his charming wife are doing their full share of community and patriotic work, tackling the drudgery and hard jobs and contributing liberally from their abundance.

As to the far famed "Shore Acres", the beautiful Simpson summer-home and estate on the rocky heights overlooking the Pacific Ocean, no effort will be made here to describe it and its spirit of hospitality. This hospitality oozes from everyone of the 1600 acres of the estate, welcoming all guests. "Shore Acres" has no society-blue-book restrictions as to its guests, being like every other real home, open to all and a welcome extended.

A description of this home and its grounds is superfluous, as its nearest realization is the castle which we all build in our dreams, magnified a hundred fold, with an added nightmare of the grand, fearsome and awe inspiring surf of the Pacific beating on the rocks a hundred feet below.

Add to that dream castle a marble plunge tank, the size of a city lot, inject a vision of a few hundred acres of virgin forests and cultivated grounds and include an acre or two of perfect gardens, with fountains, rose embowered pergolas and a tennis court overlooking the ocean and you can have some conception of "Shore Acres" and last but not least the latch string hangs so far out on the front porch that the visitors stumble on it.

The Coos Bay country is the scene of unusual spruce production, with the enlisted men of the government Spruce Division doing their full share of the work. These soldiers of the mills and logging camps are a fine bunch of fellows, good workers and proud to be doing a man's work in chasing the Crown Prince.

Editor's Note—The above squib about the Coos Bay country may not be news of local interest. It is not written entirely in appreciation of the good time shown the editor and his wife by the hospitable Coos Bay folk or as an advertisement, although we realize that as an advertisement it is worth several thousand dollars. This is written because we joyed in visiting another good community, we made full allowance for that community's natural resources and only drew comparisons in its development as directly traceable to loyalty to the home community, and the practice of true co-operation.
