ON MEMORY'S SCREEN

An Old French Town
in the Sixties

Both the men and the women are striking in appearance. On gala occasions, they present a most picturesque sight, the women with bright colored silk shawls folded crosswise over their shoulders and bosoms, wearing large white, stiffly starched caps with a fluted border, which stands up in front like an opened fan, and their ears adorned with solid gold earrings about four inches in length. These are heirlooms and are religiously handed down from mother to daughter. A hard working lot is theirs, the men go down to the sea in ships, and toil all night in every kind of weather, while the women not only tend to the house and children, but net and mend the nets, help care for the fish on its arrival, and packing it in large wicker baskets, carry it on their backs to market. The women also attend to the shrimping and mussel gathering, and they may be seen at low tide, wading in pools or walking over the slippery rocks, picking up the shell fish.

But this hard, outdoor life is a healthy one and its importunate demands keep them from temptations, which a less strenuous life affords, so the men are temperate and the women chaste. Moreover they are sincerely devout and the most careless stranger cannot but be impressed at the crew standing bareheaded, while the captain offers up a short prayer as the boats leave the harbor on their fishing expeditions. On fete days, both the men and women are seen marching reverently, in the religious processions, which are frequent and customary.

The fish market on the quay, forms another attraction of the place, and draws many visitors besides customers. The fisherwomen who do the selling, are often chosen for their good looks, so that here, may be seen at the stalls, the belles of the fisher-town. They know very well how to take care of themselves, and while perfectly willing to indulge in light badinage and chaff, promptly check
