Here it is rain, in other parts it is snow, of the two we prefer the rains, it is not so cold and there is no back breaking shovelling to do to get out.

CITY OF QUEER CONTRASTS

Nome, Desolate in Winter, is Feverishly Lively During the Short Months of Summer.

Ships approaching the coast of Alaska watch eagerly for the first glimpse of a break in the low horizon line, and as the faint silhouette of a city is caught by the spy glass word goes round that Nome is in sight. The square outlines grow steadily plainer and broader. Unmindful of the heavy waves that crash so dangerously near its doors the city is reaching out to the very water's edge to greet the incoming ship. A bobbing launch comes out to meet the ship and bring in the passengers to the shore.

The gold seekers built Nome in the rush of 1898, and the gold seekers still add their quota to its population. They have made it a city of contrasts—of ostentatious wealth and hopeless desires. Where they camped on the beach and built wooden huts and saloons the city has grown up. When more space was needed, it spread its houses along the beach in long uneven rows.

From November to June it is frozen into a dull apathy from which it rouses to attend theaters, dances, and other social frivolities which make the winter tolerable. Ice bound and dark the winter may be, with only three or four hours of pale sunlight a day, but the popular idea of the wilds of Nome is an interesting myth. Electric lights, telephones, department stores, banks, hotels—Nome has all of these perquisites of modern civilization.

When the sun begins to shine steadily and the fresh surf pounds on the beach, Nome awakes and the summer residents who have gone "outside" return. The population is practically doubled. Nome spends its summer months in wildly rushing about to make up for the enforced dullness of the frozen winter.

Miss Ida Wagner began a term of school at Currinsville last Monday.

The condition of James B. Walker has so far improved that it is hoped he may be able to sit up a little in a few days.

Mrs. J. W. Moore was in a very critical condition, for a time this week, but with skillful treatment and careful nursing she is rapidly recovering.
