Honor to Whom Honor

Our pithy, piquant, Portland esteemed contemporary The Spectator, has been accorded a well deserved unique distinction, in that one of its editorials has been offered as a part of a brief presented in the Supreme court of Oregon, by the attorney-general.

In its issue of March 29th the Spectator discussed the bearings of the suit brought by Secretary of State Olcott for the salary of governor, as upon him had fallen the responsibility of performing the gubernatorial duties, owing to the death of Governor Withycombe. If it had been only a question of salary the Spectator might not have commented on it, but it seemed to our contemporary that it evidently was "the object of the proceeding to have the Supreme Court misconstrue the state constitution by declaring that on the death of Mr. Withycombe, Mr. Olcott had become governor, and could resign as secretary of state, and name his successor to the office."

"The Spectator was at some pains to look up the law as it appears in Oregon, and to examine cases quite similar decisions that had been rendered in other states, and presented the result of its investigations for the information of its readers. Attorney-General Brown used these findings and deductions as part of his brief."
